SILABUS, SAP, DAN BAHAN AJAR

POETRY 1

PRØYEK REKONSTRUKSI DAN PENINGKATAN
UNIVERSITAS NEGERI PADANG

DISUSUN OLEH

Delvi Wahyuni, S.S.,M.A.

JURUSAN BAHASA DAN SASTRA INGGRIS
FAKULTAS BAHASA DAN SENI
UNIVERSITAS NEGERI PADANG
2012
Syllabus

General Outline of the Course

Course: Poetry 1
Study Program: English
Faculty: Arts and Languages
Docent: Dr. Kurnia Ningsih, M.A.
        : Delvi Wahyuni, S.S., M.A.

Credit Hour: 2
Code: ING 208

Learning Outcomes

Main Competence:

Upon the completion of the course, students are expected to be able appreciate poetry, especially the ones written in English.

Supporting Competences:

1. Students are able to explain the nature of poetry

2. Students are able to identify the formal qualities of elements of poetry

3. Students are able to analyze thoughts or ideas conveyed in poetry

Soft skills/Character: Students are endowed with the ability to collaborate with others; express their opinion; show high commitment and passion in what they are doing; read between the lines and think critically.
Learning Matrix:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Week</th>
<th>Learning Outcomes</th>
<th>Learning Experience</th>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Method</th>
<th>Assessment</th>
<th>References</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| 1-5  | Students are able to explain the nature of poetry                                | Students learns through interacting with reading materials given by the lecturer; discovering new knowledge through discussion with peers and share what they have got through a student led discussion | 1. The definition of poetry (week 1)
2. How to read poetry (week 2)
   - Differences it has compared to other literary genre
   - May Swenson's "Southbound Freeway"
3. The tradition of poetry (week 3)
4. Types of poetry (week 3)
Note:
Week 4 and 5 are used for students lead presentation. Each times, three groups present their case.
Poets for Presentation
1. Eating poetry
2. Some People Like Poetry
3. Poetry
4. Literaria Autobioraphia
5. The New Poem | Lecture, tutorial and discussion                                                 | 1. Informal writing by the students on the topics which have been covered
2. Students led presentation on the attitude, reception, and function of poetry | 1 (pg. 15-16)
2 (pg. 20-30)
3 (pg. 521-522, 525 - 526, 555-559)
4 (pg. 5-8, 9-16)
5 (15-22, 268) |
| 6-13 | Students are able to identify the formal qualities or elements of poetry        | Students learn that poets use several techniques in creating poetry.                 | 1. Speaker (week 6)
2. Words (week 7)
3. Figurative Languages
   - Metaphor and Simile, (week 7)
   - Personification, apostrophe,
4. Students forwarding their opinion | Lecture, and students forwarding their opinion | 1. Informal writing on the topic which have been | 3 (pg. 566-585, 645-685, 589-608)
4 (pg. 25-29, 49-50, 73-79, 105- |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>14-16</th>
<th>Students are able to analyze thoughts or ideas conveyed in poetry</th>
<th>Students learn that meanings and truths are not necessarily singular in a poem. And the same wisdom is also applicable in real life.</th>
<th>they also learns about the creative use of language in poetry</th>
<th>overstatement, understatement, metonymy, synecdoche, paradox, and pun. (week 8)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>4. Imagery (week 9)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>5. Irony and Tone (week 10)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>6. Sound and Rhythm (week 11)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Note: Week 12 and 13 are used for student led presentation. Each time, three groups present their case.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>covered.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>2. A 1-2 pages device paper</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>121, 85-95, 19-21, 33-41, 145-175, 687-707)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

|   |   |   |   |   |   | 1. ACCORDING TO MY MOOD (Benjamin Zephaniah) (Week 14) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 2. Language Barrier (Valerie Bloom) (Week 15) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 3. Background, Casually (Nissim Ezekiel) (Week 16) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 4. Do Not Say (Mohamad Bin Haji Saleh) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 5. Sun-a-shine, Rain-a-fall (Valerie Bloom) (Week 14) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | Discussions in which students are encouraged to forward their opinion. |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 1. A 3-4 pages paper to assess students' ability to discover ideas being conveyed in a poem and analyze it. |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 2. Student led presentations on ideas conveyed in poems assigned to them |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 6 (pg. 334) |
|   |   |   |   |   |   | 7 (pg. 580-582, 708-710, 814) |
References:

Lesson Plan
(SAP)

Course: Poetry 1
Credit Hour: 2

Study Program: English
Code: ING 208

Faculty: Arts and Languages

Docent: Dr. Kurnia Ningsih, M.A.
Delvi Wahyuni, S.S., M.A.

Learning Outcomes

Main Competence:
Upon the completion of the course, students are expected to be able appreciate poetry, especially the ones written in English

Supporting Competence:
Students are able to explain the nature of poetry

Soft skills/Character: Students are endowed with the ability to collaborate with others; express their opinion; show high commitment and passion in what they are doing; read between the lines and think critically.

Topics:
1. The definition of poetry
2. How to read poetry
   a. Differences it has compared to other literary genre
3. The tradition of poetry
4. Types of poetry
Lesson Plan

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>stage</th>
<th>Lecturer's Activities</th>
<th>Students' activities</th>
<th>Assessment</th>
<th>Media</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>1. Explain the overview of lesson in meeting 1-5.</td>
<td>Listen to the lecture</td>
<td></td>
<td>Syllabus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>2. Explain the benefit students can gain from their understanding of the nature of poetry</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>3. Explain the competences they should achieve by the end of meeting 5</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Presentation</td>
<td>1. Read “Southbound Freeway” aloud</td>
<td>Listen to the lecturer</td>
<td>Students led presentation on the definition, function, reception of poetry</td>
<td>Whiteboard</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>2. Activate students background knowledge on what they have known, heard, or read about poetry</td>
<td>Respond to the lecturer</td>
<td></td>
<td>PowerPoints slides</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>3. Listen to and write down students’ response on the white board.</td>
<td>Listen to the lecture</td>
<td></td>
<td>PowerPoints slides</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>4. Elicits to students about the importance of poetry in societies</td>
<td>Listen to the lecture</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
| Closing | 9. Close the session.
   a. Ask students questions on topics which have been covered
   b. Respond to students’ answer
   c. Assign them to be prepared for student led presentation which will be held in the 4th and 5th week on the definition, function and reception of poetry. | Applying practical reading strategies just explained by the lecturer
   Listen to the lecture
   Listen to the lecture | Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance.
PowerPoint slides
PowerPoint slides |
Assessment Rubric:

1. Presentation rubric (evaluating students presentation) adopted from http://www.ncsu.edu/~midlink/rub.pres.html (see appendix)

References:

Appendices:

1. PowerPoint slides print outs

2. Photocopied material forwarded to students in advance

3. Rubric to evaluate students’ presentation
POETRY: DEFINED
Dahl Widyand, S.S., M.A

A CASE FOR POETRY
- There are divides on the theory of poetry
  - To merely entertain (Hedonistic theory)
  - Art is for delight (Somerset Maugham)
  - To educate and entertain at the same time (Didactic theory)
  - ...Poetry is the bottom of criticism of life...

DEFINITION OF POETRY
- Poetry has been important in the known human history
- In ancient Japan and China, poetry was prized above anything else.
  - E.g., A samurai before his execution by his enemy pleaded to be given time to compose poetry, which was so moving and resulted in his liberation from his captor.
DEFINITION OF POETRY

- To the ancient Greeks and Romans, poetry was the medium to express their philosophy that no wonder classing like Iliad and Aeneid were written in verse.
- Don't forget that the Bible and the Koran were also written in verse.

DEFINITION OF POETRY

- It uses language to condense experience into an intensely concentrated package, with each sound, each word, each image and line carrying great weight.
- Key words:
  - Experience
  - Compact language

HOW TO READ A POEM

- To be able to understand or even contemplate on the message of anything the poem tries to convey, it is necessary for students to know what the poem says.
- Problem for EFL learners:
  - English proficiency!
HOW TO READ A POEM

o Thus, it is important to read actively o A reading strategy that involves readers with the text one is reading.
  - Previewing
  - Highlighting
  - Annotating

PREVIEWING

o It is basically the activity in which readers survey the text.
  - As in surveying, readers are only expected to see what's on the surface or clear physical attributes in the poem like:
    - The title
    - Special prints: bold, italics, underline
    - Repeated words
    - Repeated images

HIGHLIGHTING

o It is the process in which readers begin to mark the text they are reading.
  - During previewing, there might be questions on difficult words, or images, important ideas.
  - This is the time for readers to put down their questions on the marked page.
ANNOTATING

- This is the time for readers to begin answering questions they have in highlighting activities.
- The first thing to do is to deal with difficult words.
- For those in EFL situation, this is their first barrier to the poem, so this is the most important thing to do.
- This is the readers' deeper engagement with the text.

THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- Poetic diction: words that writers of poets choose to use.
- Decorum: the basis on which the poet chooses his diction from the general reservoir of words.
- Poetic license: The poet's freedom to bend the rules of language, diction, decorum, grammar in order to achieve certain effect.

THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- Poetic convention:
- Artificial and sometimes unrealistic devices that are accepted by common agreement between the artists and their public.
- Poetry: Speaker, figurative language, sounds and rhythm, meter, etc.
THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- This section will talk exclusively about the tradition in Western Poetry.
- Throughout the history there have been many poetic revolutions.
- Yet, it all begin with the tradition where Anglo-Saxon heroes' victories in wars were sung by the singers in verse.

THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- Anglo-Saxon: the importance of similar stressed consonant sound— alliteration.
- Continent’s influence: the beginning of the reign of rhyme and the question about meter
- Elizabethan poems: the importance hexameter; the development of blank verse.
- The 17th century saw the rule of heroic couplet

THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- The 18th century witnessed Romantic poets overthrew the rigidity of the heroic couplet.
- The 19th century revolution took place in America led by Walt Whitman, who had managed to gather a big crowd of followers.
- The 20th century observe the crowd shifts to Ezra Pound and Robert Frost.
THE TRADITION OF POETRY

- Elizabethan: Pastoral and platonic and musical
- The school of Donne: obsession with inner searching through symbols and metaphor
- The 18th century was full of reason and wit
- The romantics were busy looking for imagination.
- The Victorian poets were obsessed with ethical and philosophical matters.

TYPES OF POETRY

- Lyric Poetry
  - Poems expressing the thought and feeling of a single speaker.
- Narrative Poetry
  - Poems which tell stories
- Dramatic Poetry
  - Poems or speech by a dramatic characters at a certain moment in a drama
- Didactic Poetry
  - Poems written to teach
APPENDICES AND PHOTOCOPIED MATERIAL WHICH SERVES AS BOTH TEACHING MATERIAL AND STUDENTS’ WORK SHEET
Part I

- What is poetry
  - Reading Poetry
    Its differences from other literary genres
- The tradition of poetry
  - Types of poetry
Many of the great poems are in matterness; and in almost all good interesting objects of contemplation to the contemplators.

John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), On Liberty: A Political and Ethical
Is a poet of beauty does work by moving; poetry acts by altering

The essence of poetry is to affect upon emotion; poetry addresses itself
Each poet of art can develop his own concept of poetry. In order

Matthew Arnold, who was another supporter of the dialectic theory, and the mind can only respond to the stability of thought.

Nothing please many; but just representations of

There are, of course, many shades of opinions within these two

The fact is to give a true picture of life.
The truth of poetry; and the truth of poetry is truth; and there are different truths.

There are two kinds of movement; they are different things.
Their emotional truths differ from their material truths.

The definition of the deeper and more secret

Serious fiction is true poetry, but there is a radical distinction

The real interest in poetry is derived from the intellectual interest, or the interest excited by poetry.

The essence of poetry is to affect upon the heart; poetry acts by altering

Definitions of Poetry flea, the baseball fan, the statistician—not is it valid to discriminate against "business documents and hoop-books"; all these phenomena are important. One must make a distinction however: when dragged into prominence by half poets, the result is not poetry, nor till the poets among us can be "literalists of the imagination"—above insolence and triviality and can present for inspection, "imaginary gardens with real toads in them," shall we have

it. In the meantime, if you demand on the one hand, the raw material of poetry in all its rawness that which is on the other hand genuine, you are interested in poetry.

Defining Poetry

Throughout history and across various national and cultural boundaries, poetry has held an important place. In ancient China and Japan, for example, poetry was prized above all else. One story tells of a samurai warrior, when defeated, asked for a pen and paper. Thinking that he had to write a will before being executed, his captor granted his wish.

Moore quotes the Diaries of Tolstoy (New York, 1917): “Where the boundary between verse and poetry lies, I shall never be able to understand. . . . Poetry is verse; prose is verse. Or else poetry is everything with the exception of business documents and hoop books.”

References (given by Moore) to W. B. Yeats’s “William Blake and His Illustrations” (Ideas of Good and Evil, 1903): “The limitation of his view was from the very infinity of his vision; he was a too literal realist of the imagination as others are of light; and because he believed that the figures seen by the mind’s eye, when exacted by inspiration, were ‘external existences,’ symbols of divine essences, he hated very grace of style that might obscure their lineaments.”

Instead of writing a will, however, the warrior wrote a farewell poem that so moved his captor that he immediately released him.

To the ancient Greeks and Romans, poetry was the medium of spiritual and philosophical expression. Epics such as the Iliad and the Aeneid are written in verse, and so are dramas such as Oedipus the King (p. 125). Passages of the Bible, the Koran, and the Hindu holy books are also written in poetry. Today, throughout the world, poetry continues to delight and to inspire. For many people, in many places, poetry is the language of the emotions, the medium of expression they use when they speak from the heart.

Despite the longstanding place of poetry in our lives, however, many people—including poets themselves—have difficulty deciding just what poetry is. Is a poem "pure energy / horizontally contained / between the mind / of the poet and the ear of the reader," as Nikki Giovanni describes it? Or is a poem, as Archibald MacLeish says, "Dumb," "Silent," "Wordless," and "motionless in time"? Or is it simply what Marianne Moore calls "all this fiddle"?

One way of defining poetry is to say that it uses language to convey experience into an intensely concentrated package, with each sound, each word, each image, and each line carrying great weight. But beyond this lies the difficult question of what makes a particular arrangement of words or lines a poem. Part of the problem is that poetry has many guises: a poem may be short or long, accessible or obscure; it may express a mood or tell a story; it may conform to a familiar poetic form—a sonnet, a couplet, a haiku—or follow no conventional pattern; it may or may not have a regular, identifiable meter or a rhyme scheme; it may depend heavily on elaborate imagery, figures of speech, irony, complex allusions or symbols, repeated sounds—or it may include none of these features conventionally associated with poetry.

To further complicate the issue, different readers, different poets, different generations of readers and poets, and different cultures may have different expectations about poetry. As a result, they have different assumptions about poetry, and these different assumptions raise questions. Must poetry be written to delight or inspire, or can a poem have a political or social message? And must this message be conveyed subtly, embedded with imaginatively chosen sounds and words, or can it be explicit and straightforward? These questions, which have been debated by literary critics as well as by poets for many years, have no easy answers—and perhaps no answers at all. A haiku—short, rich in imagery, adhering to rigid formal structure—is certainly poetry, and so is a political poem like Wole Soyinka’s “Telephone Conversation” (p. 5). To some Western readers, however, a haiku might seem too plain and understated to be poetic, and Soyinka’s poem might seem to be a political tract masquerading as poetry.

Still, most of these readers would agree that the following lines qualify as poetry.

---
How do you read a poem? The literal-minded might say, “Just let your eye light on it”; but there is more to poetry than meets the eye. What Shakespeare called “the mind’s eye” also plays a part. Many a reader who has no trouble understanding and enjoying prose finds poetry difficult. This is to be expected. At first glance, a poem usually will make some sense and give some pleasure, but it may not yield everything at once. Poetry is not to be galloped over like the daily news: a poem differs from most prose in that it is to be read slowly, carefully, and attentively. Not all poems are difficult, of course, and some can be understood and enjoyed on first encounter. But good poems yield more if read twice; and the best poems—after ten, twenty, or a hundred readings—still go on yielding.

POETRY OR VERSE

Approaching a thing written in lines and surrounded with white space, we need not expect it to be a poem just because it is verse. (Any composition in lines of more or less regular rhythm, often ending in rhymes, is verse.) Here, for instance, is a specimen of verse that few will call poetry:

Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one Excepting February alone,
To which we twenty-eight assign
Till leap year makes it twenty-nine.

To a higher degree than that classic memory-tickler, poetry appeals to the mind and arouses feelings. Poetry may state facts, but, more important, it makes imaginative statements that we may value even if its facts are incorrect. Coleridge’s error in placing a star within the horns of the crescent moon in “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner” does not stop the passage from being good poetry, though it is faulty astronomy. According to poet Gerard Manley Hopkins, poetry is “to be heard for its own sake and interest, even over and above its interest of meaning."
There are other elements in a poem besides plain prose sense: sounds, images, rhythms, figures of speech. These may strike us and please us even before we ask, "But what does it all mean?"

This is a truth not readily grasped by anyone who regards a poem as a kind of puzzle written in secret code with a message subtly concealed. The effect of a poem (our whole mental and emotional response to it) consists of much more than simply a message. By its musical qualities, by its suggestions, it can work on the reader's unconscious. T. S. Eliot put it well when he said in The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism that the prose sense of a poem is chiefly useful in keeping the reader's mind "diverted and quiet, while the poem does its work upon him." Eliot went on to liken the meaning of a poem to the bit of meat a burglar brings along to throw to the family dog. What is the work of a poem? To touch us, to stir us, to make us glad, and possibly even to tell us something.

READING A POEM

How to set about reading a poem? Here are a few suggestions. To begin with, read the poem once straight through, with no particular expectations; read open-mindedly. Let yourself experience whatever you find, without worrying just yet about the large general and important ideas the poem contains (if indeed it contains any). Don't dwell on a troublesome word or difficult passage—just push on. Some of the difficulties may seem smaller when you read the poem for a second time; at least, they will have become parts of a whole for you.

On the second reading, read for the exact sense of all the words; if there are words you don't understand, look them up in a dictionary. Dwelt on any difficult parts as long as you need to.

If you read the poem silently, sound its words in your mind. Better still, read the poem aloud, or listen to someone else reading it. You may discover meanings you didn't perceive in it before. To decide how to speak a poem can be an excellent method of getting to understand it.

PARAPHRASE

Try to paraphrase the poem as a whole, or perhaps just the more difficult lines. In paraphrasing, we put into our own words what we understand the poem to say, restating ideas that seem essential, coming out and stating what the poem may only suggest. This may sound like a heartless thing to do to a poem, but good poems can stand it. In fact, to compare a poem to its paraphrase is a good way to see the distance between poetry and prose. In making a paraphrase, we generally work through a poem or a passage line by line. The statement that results may take as many words as the original, if not more. A paraphrase, then, is simpler than a summary, a brief condensation of gist, main idea, or story. (Summary of a horror film in TV Guide: "Demented biologist, coveting power: over New York, swells seven rats to hippopomus-size.") Here is a poem worth considering line by line. The poet writes of an island in a lake in the west of Ireland, in a region where he spent many summers as a boy.

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939)

The Lake Isle of Innisfree

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,
And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made:
Nine bean-rows will I have there, a hive for the honey-bee,
And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,
Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
There midnight's all a glimmer, and noon a purple glow,
And evening full of the linnet's wings.

I will arise and go now, for always night and day
I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore;
While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements gray,
I hear it in the deep heart's core.

Though relatively simple, this poem is far from simple-minded. We need to absorb it slowly and thoughtfully. At the start, for most of us, it raises problems: what are wattles, from which the speaker's dream-cabin is to be made? We might guess, but in this case it will help to consult a dictionary; they are "poles interwoven with sticks or branches, formerly used in building as frameworks for support walls or roofs." Evidently, this getaway house will be built in an old-fashioned way: it won't be a prefabricated log cabin or A-frame house, nothing modern or citified. The phrase bee-loud glade certainly isn't commonplace language, but right away, we can understand it, at least partially: it's a place loud with bees. What is a glade? Experience might tell us that it is an open space in woods, but if that word stops us, we can look it up. Although the linnet doesn't live in North America, it is a creature with wings—a songbird of the finch family, adds the dictionary. But even if we don't make a special trip to the dictionary to find linnet, we probably recognize that the word means "bird," and the line makes sense to us.

A paraphrase of the whole poem might go something like this (in language easier to forget than that of the original): "I'm going to get up now, go to Innisfree, build a cabin, plant beans, keep bees, and live peacefully by myself amid nature and beautiful light. I want to because I can't forget the sound of that lake water. When I'm in the city, a gray and dingy place, I seem to hear it deep inside me."

These dull remarks, roughly faithful to what Yeats is saying, seem a long way from poetry. Nevertheless, they make certain things clear. For one, they spell out what the poet merely hints at in his choice of the word gray: that he finds the city, a gray place, to be faithful to forget than that of the original: "I'm going to get up now, go to Innisfree, build a cabin, plant beans, keep bees, and live peacefully by myself amid nature and beautiful light. I want to because I can't forget the sound of that lake water. When I'm in the city, a gray and dingy place, I seem to hear it deep inside me."

These dull remarks, roughly faithful to what Yeats is saying, seem a long way from poetry. Nevertheless, they make certain things clear. For one, they spell out what the poet merely hints at in his choice of the word gray: that he finds the city, a gray place, to be
Recognizing Kinds of Poetry

Most poems are either narrative poems, which recount a story, or lyric poems, which communicate a speaker’s mood, feelings, or state of mind.

Narrative Poetry

Although any brief poem that tells a story, such as Edwin Arlington Robinson’s “Richard Cory” (p. 827), may be considered a narrative poem, the two most familiar forms of narrative poetry are the epic and the ballad.
Chapter 12

Reading and Writing about Poetry

Reading Poetry

Sometimes readers approach poetry purely for pleasure. At other times, reading a poem is the first step toward writing about it. The following guidelines, which focus on issues discussed elsewhere in this section of the text, may help direct your reading.

- Rephrase the poem in your own words. What does your paraphrase reveal about the poem’s subject and central concerns? What is lost or gained in your paraphrase of the poem?
- Consider the poem’s voice. Who is the poem’s persona or speaker? How would you characterize the poem’s tone? Is the poem ironic? (See Chapter 13.)
- Study the poem’s diction and look up unfamiliar words in a dictionary. How does word choice affect your reaction to the poem? What do the connotations of words reveal about the poem? What level of diction is used? Is dialect used? Is word order unusual or unexpected? How does the arrangement of words contribute to your understanding of the poem? (See Chapter 14.)
- Examine the poem’s imagery. What kind of imagery predominates? What specific images are used? Is a pattern of imagery present? How does imagery enrich the poem? (See Chapter 15.)
Metonymy or synecdoche? Apostrophe? How do figures of speech affect your reading of the poem? (See Chapter 16.)

Listen to the sound of the poem. Are rhythm and meter regular or irregular? How do rhythm and meter reinforce the poem's central concerns? Does the poem use alliteration? Assonance? Rhyme?

How do these elements enhance the poem? (See Chapter 17.)

How does the poem's form reinforce its ideas? (See Chapter 18.)

- Consider the poem's use of symbol, allegory, allusion, or myth. Does the poem make use of symbols? Allusions? How do symbols or allusions support its theme? Is the poem an allegory?

- Does the poem retell or interpret a myth? (See Chapter 19.)

- Identify the poem's theme. What central theme or themes does the poem explore? How are the themes expressed? (See Chapter 11.)

ACTIVE READING

When you approach a poem that you plan to write about, you engage in the same active reading strategies you use when you read a short story or play. When you finish recording your reactions to the poem, you focus on a topic, develop ideas about that topic, decide on a thesis, prepare an outline, and draft and revise your essay.

Catherine Whittaker, a student in an introduction to literature course, was asked to write a three- to five-page essay comparing any two of the seven poems about parents that appear in the exercise in Chapter 2 (pp. 531-536). Her instructor told the class that the essay should reflect students' own reactions to the poems, not the opinions of literary critics. As Catherine planned and wrote her paper, she was guided by the process described in Chapter 2, "Reading and Writing about Literature."

Previewing

Catherine began her work by previewing the poems, eliminating those she considered obscure or difficult and those whose portrait of the speaker's parent did not seem sympathetic.

This process helped Catherine to narrow down her choices. As she looked through "Those Winter Sundays," she was struck by words in the opening lines ("Sundays too...", "blueblack cold"). She had the same reaction to "The squat pen rests; snug as a gun" in line 2 of "Digging." Each time, the words made Catherine want to examine the poem further.

She noticed too that both poems were divided into stanzas of varying lengths and that both focused on fathers. Keeping these features in mind, Catherine began a close reading of each poem.

Highlighting and Annotating

Catherine read and reread "Those Winter Sundays" and "Digging," she highlighted and annotated these words, symbols, and questions. The highlighted and annotated text follow.

---

ROBERT HAYDEN

(1913-1980)

Those Winter Sundays

(1962)

Like all other days of the week, Sundays too, my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, why did he get up before dawn?
then with cracked hands that ached, what kind of job did the father have?
from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him. Was there a large family?

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
When the rooms were warm, he'd call, and slowly I would rise and dress, fearing the chronic angers of that house.

Was there a problem in the family?

Speaking indifferently to him, who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as
What did I know, what did I know of love's austere and lonely offices?

Was there a mother around?
SEAMUS HEANEY
(1939- )

Digging
(1966)

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.
Under my window, a clean rasping sound
When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
My father, digging. I look down

Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
Bends low, comes up twenty years away
Stooping in rhythm through potato drills
Where he was digging.

The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
To scatter new potatoes that he picked Loving their cool hardness in our hands.

By God, the old man could handle a spade,
Just like his old man.

My grandfather cut more turf in a day
Than any other man on Toner’s bog.
Once I carried him milk in a bottle
Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up
To drink it, then fell to right away

Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods
Over his shoulder, going down and down
For the good turf. Digging.

The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap
Of soggy peat, the cut cuts of an edge
Through living roots awakened in my head.
But I’ve no spade to follow men like them.

Between my finger and my thumb

Two generations could “handle” a spade. Can the poet dig?

Almost like an art of digging?

Catherine found the language of both poems appealing, and she believed highlighting and annotating had given her some valuable insights. For example, she noticed some parallels between the two poems: both focus the past, both portray fathers as hard workers, and neither mentions a mother.

PLANNING AN ESSAY

Even though Catherine still had to find a specific topic for her paper, her preliminary work suggested some interesting possibilities. She was especially intrigued by the way both poems depict fathers as actively engaged in physical tasks.

Choosing a Topic

The idea Catherine thought she might want to write about was the significance of the sons’ attitudes toward their fathers: although both see their fathers as hard workers, the son in “Those Winter Sundays” seems to have mixed feelings about his father’s devotion to his family, whereas the son in “Digging” is more appreciative. Catherine explored this idea in the two journal entries that follow:
So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

1. What words in this poem are effective primarily because of their connotation?
2. Compare this poem with “Call It a Good Marriage.” In which poem does the ending come as the greater surprise?

POETIC DICTION

The words that a poet or any other writer or speaker chooses to use are called his diction. Critics and poets have long been interested in the relationship between the diction of poetry and the diction of ordinary speech. In some ages they have held that the two dictions resemble each other closely; in others, they have held the opposite view. In the so-called Augustan Age of English poetry (about 1660-1790), for instance, the authors of serious poems avoided words that had acquired “low” or familiar associations from extensive use; in place of these they used fancier or more dignified expressions. Thus Smollett’s “Ode to Leven-Water” (page 262) has swain for shepherd, lave for wash, and scaly brood for school of fish. Against such embellished diction some poets of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries protested. In 1800 Wordsworth asserted that “there neither is, nor can be, any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition.” He thought that a poem should not have a special kind of language, but that it should be written in “a selection of the language really spoken by men.” Consequently when he wrote about a shepherd, he called him “a shepherd”; sheep he called “sheep.” Expressions like “keeper of the fleecy people” he labeled as “poetic diction”—a term that always had a derogatory connotation to him.

But Wordsworth had his own notions of what poetic diction should be; his own diction is no less poetic merely because it differs from the diction of the poets that preceded him. The word selection in the passage just quoted (“a selection of the language really spoken by men”) implies that Wordsworth did not consider the language of poetry identical with the spoken language. He knew that a good poet selects his words much more carefully than a casual talker ever does.
CHAPTER ONE

The term poetic diction, then, need not be a term of abuse; it may instead refer to the total differences between the language of poetry and the language of common speech at any given time. In our own day T. S. Eliot has said that every age has its own poetic diction.

DECORUM

The basis on which a poet selects his diction from the general supply of words is called decorum. E. E. Cummings follows a different decorum in each of the two following poems, with the result that the diction in one poem is very different from that in the other.

All in Green Went My Love Riding

All in green went my love riding

on a great horse of gold

into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
the merry deer ran before.

Fleeter be they than dappled dreams the swift sweet deer
the red rarc deer.

Four fleet does at a gold valley

the famished arrow sang before.

Bow at belt went my love riding riding the mountain down
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
the sheer peaks ran before.

Paler be they than daunting death the sleek slim deer
the tall tense deer.

Four tall stags at a green mountain the lucky hunter sang before.

All in green went my love riding
on a great horse of gold
into the silver dawn.

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
my heart fell dead before.

Nobody Loses All the Time

nobody loses all the time
i had an uncle named Sol who was a born failure and nearly everybody said he should have gone into vaudeville perhaps because my Uncle Sol could sing McCann He Was a Diver on Xmas Eve like Hell Itself which may or may not account for the fact that my Uncle Sol indulged in that possibly most inexcusable of all to use a highfalootin phrase luxuries that is or to wit farming and be it needlessly added
my Uncle Sol's farm failed because the chickens ate the vegetables so my Uncle Sol had a chicken farm till the skunks ate the chickens when my Uncle Sol had a skunk farm but the skunks caught cold and died and so my Uncle Sol imitated the skunks in a subtle manner or by drowning himself in the watertank but somebody who'd given my Uncle Sol a Victor Victrola and records while he lived presented to him upon the auspicious occasion of his decease a scrumptious not to mention splendidiferous funeral with tall boys in black gloves and flowers and everything and i remember we all cried like the Missouri when my Uncle Sol's coffin lurched because somebody pressed a button (and down went my Uncle
Sol and started a worm farm)

E. E. CUMMINGS

No one would ever make the mistake of thinking that a line or phrase quoted from one of these poems was taken from the other. The diction of the first poem is romantic and heraldic, as if it were a medieval troubadour's song or a description of a medieval tapestry. The diction of the second has the distinctive twang of American speech. Cummings would have violated decorum—that is, he would have had two conflicting bases for choosing his words in one poem—if he had used such adjectives as scrumptious and splendidiferous in "All in Green." These words are facetious, and they are therefore appropriate in "Nobody Loses," a facetious poem. Decorum demands appropriate diction.

Decorum of language is a very useful concept to a poet, for if he did not have a decorum he could not violate it. Poets in every age, but especially in the seventeenth and twentieth centuries, have delighted in violating decorum. Donne, for instance, begins a love poem with language appropriate to back-fence argument: "For God's sake, hold your tongue!" This opening is much more unexpected than it would be if a decorum for love poems had not been established. The unexpected always depends for its existence on the expected.

To Any Member of My Generation

What was it you remember—the summer mornings
Down by the river at Richmond with a girl,
And as you kissed, clumsy in bathing costumes,
History guffawed in a rosebush. O what a warning—
If only we had known, if only we had known!
And when you looked in mirrors was this meaning
Plain as the pain in the centre of a pearl?
Horrible tomorrow in Teutonic postures
Making absurd the past we cannot disown?

Whenever we kissed we cocked the future's rifles
And from our wild-oat words, like dragon's teeth,
Death underfoot now arises; when we were gay
Dancing together in what we hoped was life,
Who was it in our arms but the whores of death
Whom we have found in our beds today, today?

George Barker

Richmond (2): resort city up the Thames River a short distance from London. dragon's teeth (11): In Greek mythology, when Cadmus slew a dragon and sowed its teeth on a plain, armed men sprang up from them.

This poem opens nostalgically with an invitation to recall pleasant summer scenes of love-making by a river. Suddenly, in line 4, History is discovered lurking in a rosebush and watching the lovers like a dirty-minded old man. The reader is surprised, for he does not expect History to be followed by guffawed; decorum seems to require something more dignified. Yet this unexpected juxtaposition is essential to what the poem is saying: History gave a ribald leer at the innocent young lovers, even as the coming of World War II mocked a whole generation. Barker is saying that his generation led their usual lives, ignorant of the coming war and unaware that they were soon to be swallowed up in it.

POETIC LICENSE

Poets are allowed—and take—much greater freedom with language than other writers and speakers. Poetic license, the right of a poet to deviate from standard practices in order to achieve a certain effect, allows him to ignore rules that prose writers customarily follow. Poetic license takes many forms. A poet may, for instance, invent new words or jam together old ones; he may leave their referents implied rather than stated. He may use a noun to do the work of an adjective or verb, an adjective to do the work of a noun. When Shakespeare's Cleopatra says of Caesar,

He words me, girls, he words me, that I should not Be noble to myself

she is turning the noun word into a verb. Among modern poets E. E. Cummings especially uses this device:

What If a Much of a Which of a Wind

what if a much of a which of a wind gives the truth to summer's lie; blesstes this universe in two,
bloodies with dizzying leaves the sun peels forever out of his grave and sprinkles nowhere with me and you?
Blows soon to never and never to twice (blow life to isn't: blow death to war)
—ill nothing's only our hugest home;
the most who die, the more we live

E. E. CUMMINGS

Poets also take liberties with syntax, the order of words in a sentence. There are even a few poems consisting entirely of words and phrases rather than of complete sentences. But the most common syntactical liberties are various kinds of inversions of prose order. "All in green went my love riding," writes Cummings, rather than "My love went riding all in green." Requirements of rhyme and rhythm often make it necessary to change the normal order of words, though excessive use of this license, as in the metrical paraphrase of Psalm 23 (see page 175), is a defect in a poem. A poet is supposed to be able to control the form of his poem; it should not control him.

EXERCISE 5

What kinds of poetic license are found in these poems?

To-day and Thee

The appointed winners in a long-stretch'd game;
The course of Time and nations—Egypt, India, Greece and Rome;
The past entire, with all its heroes, histories, arts, experiments, its store of songs, inventions, voyages, teachers, books, Garner'd for now and thee—To think of it!
The heirdom all converged in thee!

WALT WHITMAN
Spring and Fall: To a Young Child

Margaret, are you grieving Over Goldengrove unleaving?
Leaves, like the things of man, you
With your fresh thoughts care for, can you?
Ah! as the heart grows older
It will come to such sights colder
By and by, nor spare a sigh
Though worlds of wanwood leafmeal lie;
And yet you will weep and know why.
Now no matter, child, the name:
Sorrow's springs are the same.
Nor mouth had, no nor mind, expressed
What heart heard of, ghost guessed:
It is the blight man was born for,
It is Margaret you mourn for.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

PARAPHRASE

A bold use of poetic license, coupled with unfamiliar words, may make it difficult for a reader to grasp the sense of a poem. One useful way to help overcome the difficulty is to write a paraphrase. A paraphrase is a word-for-word rendering of a poem, or part of a poem, into clear prose. Although it is seldom necessary to paraphrase a whole poem, here, for purposes of demonstration, is a poem followed by a complete paraphrase.

On My First Daughter

Here lies to each her parent's ruth,
Mary, the daughter of their youth;
Yet all heaven's gifts, being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence;

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS
while? I suppose a good intention would be to communicate a stirring narrative, an original and important idea, or a reminiscent desire to express only his personal idiosyncrasies (and there are many such) is no poet at all but an exhibitionist. All art, in spite of many modern tendencies to the contrary, is more or less enduring as its intention is more or less communal, granted that the receptive community is the intelligent and responsive part of the general population. That is a minority and always has been. The audience for verse is like a pyramid, the influence of critics increasing as we approach the tapering point at the top.

At the bottom of the pyramid is the unguided and sometimes uneducated part of the audience that loves rhymed platitudes and only occasionally, as it were by chance, deviates into appreciation of some solitary masterpiece. Rhymesters like Edgar Guest are the laureates of the many, who will vindicate their choice with almost passionate conviction against the claims of what they would call “high-brow” poetry. Once when Robert Frost was lecturing in Detroit, he made some jesting reference to Edgar Guest, forgetting that Detroit was his home town. At the end of the lecture an indignant dowager swept up to the platform. “What kind of car do you drive?” she asked belligerently. “A Ford,” said Frost. “Mr. Guest,” said she, “drives a Cadillac.”

One solitary masterpiece often known to such people is Gray’s Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard. Almost from the moment of its publication, this great poem captured the eager many and the discriminating few (with the exception of Dr. Johnson, whose prejudice against Gray was natural, almost prophetic, in view of the fact that in Gray’s work were many buds that were to be among the flowers of romanticism a few decades later). Another popular masterpiece is Edward FitzGerald’s Rubaiyat, but we can not put this in a class with the Elegy. It is quotable and at times magnificent, but the phrasing is almost too glib to be true, and much of its charm is in the exotic background, which convinces only for the moment, like stage scenery.

Just a little higher on the pyramid is the audience that loves the bad poems of good poets and hence does those poets a good deal of harm. The most conspicuous victim in our own times of such lethal enthusiasm is Edna Millay. Her popularity among people who chose all the wrong things—the Bohemian (or Greenwich Village) pieces, especially that nauseating little bit beginning, “My candle burns at both ends,” and some of the more absurd poems of passion, that might well have dragged her into oblivion along with Elinor Glynn and Ella Wheeler Wilcox—such popularity made conventional reviewers who aspired to be taken for critics afraid to risk their reputations by praising her. The fact is that she was, when freed of affectation and propaganda, a very fine poet, and nowhere more so than in the posthumous volume Mine the Harvest.

Before I ascend to the next step of the pyramid, the reader will, I hope, grant me a little digression. I have just spoken of Edna Millay as occasionally a “very fine” poet. There is an almost insurmountable difficulty in assigning poets to their relative places by means of adjectives. If we speak of a “great” poet, we are putting him in a very small company, and the word is often misapplied. Yet if we speak of a “good” poet, which ought to mean just what it says, nevertheless, we seem to be damning him with faint praise. Then there is the difficulty with the words “major” and “minor.” Theoretically, a major poet should be one who, like Shakespeare, deals with major themes in substantial bulk, and a minor poet should be one who deals with minor themes within a small scope. Excellence may, again theoretically, be attributed to a minor as well as to a major poet: Herrick is as good in his way as Shakespeare in his. But this distinction has, unfortunately, been lost, and if I should speak of Herrick as a minor poet, the reader would conclude that I meant second-rate. There is no solution for these adjetival problems, which I call to the reader’s attention for his guidance in reading reviews and criticisms, including my own.

And now we may ascend to the next step of the pyramid. Here we find an audience of wide yet discriminating interest in poetry. These readers have, or desire to have, more information on the subject in order to enlarge the scope for their appreciation and give them more confidence in their own judgments. To this enlightened minority I address this book, and I need not describe it further.

At the apex of the pyramid is the small group of the elite, critics as well as poets. One of the most common foibles of mankind is the desire to be counted among the elite. Every member of the human race is a snob of one sort or another. Virgil’s Aeneid presented the Emperor Augustus with princely Trojan ancestors, and Layamon’s Brut d'Angleterre did no less for the kings of England. In our own country every kind of organization exists for the veneration and display of ancestry, and more coats of arms adorn our hallways than ever the College of Heralds acknowledged. An ancestor of my own, writing shortly after the American Revolution, tells how itinerant peddlers went through New England selling coats of arms to the same men who, not a decade before, had been firing their flintlocks at the aristocracy they came to emulate.

It is not strange that the literary elite (and they have certain social overtones as well) should pour their influence down the pyramid and, in our time, set fashions in both poetry and criticism that have puzzled some, converted others, and, in any case, scared off so many readers who might have enjoyed poetry, that never before in history has the audience been so small or so uncertain of its own taste. This situation will be discussed more at length in my conclusion.

It is difficult to describe the ideal reader of poetry, because poetry itself is undefinable. It is like electricity, which is beyond though we still continue to light our lamps. It is like life itself, which remains a mystery, although, by the accumulation of we may learn to live well and wisely. So it is with the judgment of poetry: the continued familiarity with it develops an audience capable of an instinctive choice of the best.

The Development of Poetic Style

In the twentieth century there have been a number of revolutions in poetry that will go down in literary history, though some of the exemplars of them may not. For example, the "imagism" of Lowell is an item that history will have to record, but her own writings are a lifeless heap of labored and synthetic decorations. The audience that she attracted by her personal vigor and keenness has fallen away, and it is not likely that she will gain a new one. Many fashionable poets have suffered the same fate. No poet of his time was more popular than Abraham Cowley, who survives in literary history but is seldom read. Within thirty years his works were neglected, and in 1737 Pope could write, "Who now reads Cowley?" —a cruel but not inappropriate question.

With so many schools and experiments as we have at present, we are forced to go back and consider which qualities in poetry remain true amid changes of taste, and which are merely passing phenomena. As a background for conclusions, let us look into the history of our poetry and consider the evolution of form and content, both in this passage and in chapters to come.

Anglo-Saxon verse was written in lines of four accents with a pause dividing the line into two halves. Each accent had an indeterminate number of weak syllables grouped around it. There was no rhyme, but alliteration, similar stressed consonant sounds, adorned the verse. Some two centuries before Chaucer, our verse began shifting its emphasis from the alliterative patterns of the Anglo-Saxons to the rhymed pattern of the Continent. The transitional poem, partly alliterated and partly rhymed, was Layamon's Brut, c. 1225. That was the first evolution into the rhymed and metered verse that we know.

Such changes do not necessarily involve discarding what has gone before. We still use alliteration, though not in a fixed scheme, and some of the syllabic freedom of Anglo-Saxon verse with a good deal more restraint, so that we have many irregularities that would be impossible in formal French verse. The meters that we know today, many of them established in the writings of Geoffrey Chaucer, supplanted the somewhat limited technique of ancient times, yet absorbed some of its principles.

Such evolution is like a natural growth, a survival of the fittest. Elements that aid or enrich expression are retained; the rest discarded.

The next experiment was a failure, yet influenced our verse. English verse, as we know, is measured by accents, classic verse by long and short syllables, or time meter. Read the following line with as little accent or stress as possible and emphasizing the difference between the long and short syllables, and you will get some idea of a metric based on equal time units:

Golden the dreams from her childhood, bright on the lawn and the peachbough.

It is impossible to maintain this effect in our verse, for English is basically an accentual language. Some of the early Elizabethans did not agree, and attempted to substitute time meter for accent meter. * Accentual meter is sometimes called qualitative verse; time meter, quantitative verse, but I have abandoned these terms as confusing and awkward.

*
Richard Stanyhurst tried it in his translation of the Aeneid, with comical results. I quote for the amusement of the reader this description of Dido dying on her funeral pyre:

Thrice did she endeavor to mount and rest on her elbow;
Thrice to her bed sliding she quails, with whirling eyesight
Up to the sky staring, with belling screechcry she roareth,
When she the desired sunbeams with faint eye receiveth.

Incited by an academic pedant named Gabriel Harvey, poets as capable as Spenser and Sidney made tentative experiments in classical time units. The Elizabethan public became greatly interested. When Queen Elizabeth visited a grammar school and asked the children what they would like her to talk about, they requested an example of the classic hexameter in English, to which the Queen replied, extemporizing:

Persius a crab-staff, bawdy Martial, Ovid a fine way.

The hexameter is faulty, but the wonder is that it was requested or produced at all. In what school would our children demand a hexameter and what President would be able to accommodate them?

The musician-poet Thomas Campion brought matters to a head with his pamphlet, Observations in the Art of English Poesie (1602), in which he not only discarded rhyme and accentual meter but provided examples of the classic forms transferred to English verse. This essay was answered by the gentle poet Samuel Daniel, in his Defence of Rhyme (1603), in which he wondered that a poet of such commendable rhymes as Campion should attack rhyme. Out of all this controversy, with its scores of attempts in time meter, just one poem, a superb poem, survives, Campion's Rose-cheeked Laura:

- Rose-checked Laura, come;
- Sing thou smoothly with thy beauty's
- Silent music, either other
- Sweetly gracing.
- Lovely forms do flow
- From consent divinely framed:
- Heav'n is music, and thy beauty's
- Birth is heavenly.

Blank verse as the vehicle for drama was one of the most important developments in the Age of Elizabeth. I have described elsewhere its invention in the Earl of Surrey's translation of Virgil, its transformation in Marlowe's mighty line into a medium of such strength that it served as the foundation of Shakespeare's dramatic verse. Shakespeare's flexible technique not only evolved within itself but absorbed variations from other playwrights, notably, in his later plays, from Fletcher. Fletcher made extensive use of what is sometimes called the "monosyllabic feminine ending"; that is, unlike the normal feminine ending, like "feather," where the weak syllable is part of the last word, it employs two monosyllabic words: thus, from Fletcher's The Wild-goose Chase:

And I'll be short; I'll tell you because I love you, and from Shakespeare's Henry the Eighth:

She shall be lov'd and fear'd; her own shall bless her.

On no other evidence than the prevalence of these endings in Henry the Eighth, some foolish scholars have assigned the play, or at least part of it, to Fletcher. This is nonsense; the play is Shakespeare's throughout. The most annoying aspect of that wrong attribution is that Shakespeare's beautiful song in Henry the Eighth, "Orpheus with his lute," is in many anthologies assigned to Fletcher, or to Shakespeare with a question mark.

Elizabethan dramatic blank verse established the form in a series of important works which have extended down to our own day in much of the work of E. A. Robinson and Robert Frost.

The next swing of the pendulum in English verse was John Donne's deliberate roughening of meter, distributing his accents... with wild freedom so that in many of his lines we have an unexpected jar when an accent pounds a syllable where the meter does not demand it, or a feeling of surprised emptiness where an accent is missing from its accustomed place. Ben Jonson remarked to William Drummond of Hawthornden that "Donne for not keeping of accent deserved hanging" and that "Donne himself for not being understood would perish." This prophecy nearly came true, for after his death Donne was almost entirely forgotten until his revival in the 1920s, since when he has been overpraised. His influence on modern English and American poetry has been enormous under the aegis of T.S. Eliot.

In the mid seventeenth century, Edmund Waller revolted against the looseness and roughness of Donne and his followers and imposed on English verse the tight, closed five-stress couplet, commonly called the Heroic Couplet, in which the verse is entirely smooth and each couplet has an independent syntax, never overflowing into any other. Waller's couplet, the vehicle for Dryden's long poems and the exclusive vehicle for Pope, ruled the eighteenth century, until once again the pendulum swung, and the Romantic poets overthrew it, and when they did write couplets, they delighted in opening them so that one would glide into another through whole paragraphs, as in Keats's Endymion:

A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:
Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothing...et cetera...; but still will keep
A bower quiet for us and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.
Therefore, on every morrow, are we wreathing
A flowery band to bind us to the earth,
Spite of despondence, of the inhuman dearth
Of noble natures, of the gloomy days,
Of all the unhealthy and o'erdarkened ways
Made for our searching....

And so forth. Perhaps Keats overdid it. Revolutionaries always go to extremes.

A single poem of great significance in the development of our verse is Coleridge's Christabel. Whether this poem was merely symptomatic of Romantic freedom in general or directly influential on the work of other poets, we cannot know, but it embodied certain principles that are with us still. Coleridge noted that "the meter of Christabel is not, properly speaking, irregular, though it may seem so from its being founded on a new principle; namely, that of counting in each line the accents, not the syllables. Though the latter may vary from seven to twelve, yet in each line the accents will be found to be only four."
The verse easily absorbs these irregularities:

- The night is chill; the forest bare;
- Is it the wind that moaneth bleak?
- There is not wind enough in the air
- To move away the ringlet curl
- From the lovely lady's cheek—
- There is not wind enough to twirl
- The one red leaf, the last of its clan,
- That dances as often as dance it can,
- Hanging so light, and hanging so high,
- On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky.

It is not necessary to go into Coleridge's application of his principle and the fact that he did not always have the four accents and that the variety of the syllables ranged from four to thirteen. The two important points are that the principle was by no means "new" as Coleridge stated, and that from the time of the Romantic poets to the present day it has been accepted as one phase of poetic practice, especially in four-stress verse. Readers who have followed my exposition will easily recognize Coleridge's "new" principle as the fundamental rule in Anglo-Saxon verse. It was also used freely in Elizabethan song poetry. Modern poets avail themselves of this syllabic freedom, sometimes to excess. It is not, in general, applied to five-stress verse, though both Robert Bridges and his friend Gerard Manley Hopkins extended it to the pentameter (see pages 84 and 18).

The next revolt took place in America, and was, of course, Whitman's. I should not call Whitman's work free verse, however, but dithyrambic verse; that is, a basically metrical rhythm over which play extra syllables or long pauses where syllables are missing. The surprising that modern poetry should abound in schools and innovators. In general, we have passed through our “metaphysical” period, and the influence of T. S. Eliot is on the decline. The trend now favors the elegance and precision of the eighteenth century.

In our quick and turbulent age, change will doubtless be more frequent than in the past, and the problem of the critic more complex. What roots should we look for to determine whether a poet is a living growth or a parasite without roots—like mistletoe, beloved by druids and young lovers but scarcely desired by the oak? How shall we distinguish between the fakirs and the prophets?

All that we can say is that the majority of the modern poets who give us satisfaction, such as Bridges, Frost, Robinson, Sassoon, Hodgson, and the great Irish school of Yeats, Stephens, and Gogarty, regard life, in spite of its dissonances, as essentially a harmony in which they are a part. They are at home in this world.

It is not true, as some critics contend, that attention to the past—both history and poetic tradition—dulls the perceptions to what is going on around one. In Robert Bridges’ philosophical epic, _The Testament of Beauty_, the timelessness of the images is a delight. The poet gives us a picture of himself as he sits on his porch composing his “loose Alexandrines.” As he writes, he sees an ouzel building her nest in the rafters. Or an aeroplane passes through the sky and into his poem. Or a steam thrasher chatters in the field beyond. All these realistic and modern details he weaves into the timeless theme of his poem, which celebrates the gradual evolution of the spirit of man toward perfection.

We might say that all great poetry, of whatever age, has the power of moving on through the years, keeping pace with mankind through his ever-changing landscape. It is the second-rate, following the current vogue, that soon goes out of fashion. All great poetry is modern. “Chaucer’s power of fascination is enduring,” as Matthew Arnold noted. We can go back even farther than Chaucer and relive with the authors of antiquity the adventures, material and spiritual, which are with us in the flash and music of their lines.

Most of our great poets have added to their native tradition a knowledge of the ancients. A recent example of one so influenced is A. E. Housman. His work is the tragic song of the English countryside and its simple folk. His diction depends for its effect al-meter changes from one kind to another with the greatest freedom. When he is writing at his lyric best, his meter is most noticeable, as for example:

-Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,
-Out of the mocking bird’s throat, the musical shuttle,
-Out of the Ninth-month midnight,
-Over the sterile sand’s and the fields beyond where the child leaving his bed wandering alone, bareheaded, barefoot…

The accents here are muted, and the verse has almost the effect of classic dactylic meter. Again, we have a loose iambic effect in

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom’d,
And the great star early droop’d in the western sky in the night,
I mourn’d, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring.

We do not find completely non-metrical verse until we come to the work of Stephen Crane, Carl Sandburg, and William Carlos Williams, to name only three of the best known out of a large crowd.

Today there are innumerable varieties of experience in verse, from the free and incomprehensible _Cantos_ of Ezra Pound to the strict traditionalism—classicism, one might say—of Robert Frost.

Modes of thought change as well as forms of poetry and the two are inextricably bound together. The Elizabethans were pastoral, Platonic, and steeped in music. The school of Donne was obsessed with inner searching of the self, and thought in terms of symbols and fantastic metaphors. The eighteenth century made reason its guide and wit its idiom. Pope and his school had an aversion to wild nature; they preferred parks and formal gardens and the elegance of the strict heroic couplet. The Romantic poet looked to imagination rather than reason as his guide and loved the solitudes of forest and hill, where, amid untrammeled Nature, he could feel akin to cosmic forces and tune his soul to immensity.

The great Victorians were concerned with ethical and philosophical matters, with the exception of Browning’s dramatic monologues, which, like Chaucer’s _Canterbury Tales_, but from a far different angle, sprang from a sheer delight in observing people and the human comedy.

With all these changes of form and content behind us, it is not most wholly on words of native stock. His forms, too, are basic, usually variations of the folk ballad. But reading on, having followed him through Shropshire and through folk poetry, we strike a deeper root, one that goes back to the Greeks, their restraint, polish, and exalted stoicism. It is not surprising to learn that Housman lived a double life, as poet and as Classical scholar.

Or take Robert Frost. He sprang into fame as the exponent of northern New England in the cadences of its own idiom. Reading carefully, we hear the controlled music of his conversational style. His realism is not photographic; it is symbolic of the relation between man and nature and God, and the redeeming companionship between man and man. Most of his poems are dialogues between two people in the poem or between the poet and his reader. When we seek the roots that sustain his poetry, we at first find the obvious one, that of New England and Emerson, and there is another going back through English literature to the work of George Crabbe, and yet another that goes back to Greek literature and thought.

Frost is an excellent Greek scholar, and the light of Athens is on his philosophy. Some years ago at an academic gathering a student was arguing in favor of the rootless kind of poetry then in vogue and against formal education for the poet. He cited Frost as a poet who had developed through his inborn talent without recourse to the past. By good fortune, a professor of Greek, who had formerly taught Frost at Harvard, was among those present. He took us up into his study and produced his old records. Opposite Frost’s name, across the page, recitation after recitation, test after test, was an unbroken series of Ἀς.

The deepest root of poetry penetrates so far that it loses itself in the entangled aspirations of mankind. A good poet is at home in his countryside and his world, and at one with the spirits and traditions of the past. These truths, however, are but aspects of the one truth that poetry is the highest expression of what is most natural to man in every phase of his life. The single idea of the poet is to create from disharmony, harmony; from formlessness, form, and to be glad in the work of his hands for its own sake, whether or not anyone will, in the future, remember his name.
When I resemble her to thee
How sweet and fair she seems to be.

'Tell her that's young
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

'Then die, that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee;
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair!

EDMUND WALLER

1. Paraphrase line 2 and give synonyms for resemble (line 4), deserts (line 5), and suffer (line 14).

2. What does the speaker of the poem want? Trace the argumentative progression.

3. What is the theme? The tone?

CONVENTIONS AND TRADITIONS

Poems, like all other forms of art, have their conventions—artificial and sometimes unrealistic devices that are accepted by common agreement between the artist and his public. In the movies, for instance, the passage of time is sometimes indicated by a series of rapidly flashed pictures of newspaper headlines and easily recognized events. The audience may spend only a minute looking at the pictures, yet it agrees to accept that minute as equivalent to twenty-five years in the hero's life. Among the conventions of poems are rhyme, meter, fixed forms, symbols—in fact, any of the devices that make poems different from ordinary discourse. One kind of poem—necessarily excluded from this book because of its length—which makes elaborate use of conventions is Originally, as its Greek name suggests, a lyric was a poem sung to the music of a lyre. This earlier meaning—a poem made for singing—is still current today, when we use lyric to mean the words of a popular song. But the kind of printed poem we now call a lyric is usually something else, for over the past five hundred years the nature of lyric poetry has changed greatly. Ever since the invention of the printing press in the fifteenth century, poets have written less often for singers, more often for readers. In general, this tendency has made lyric poems contain less word-music and (since they can be pondered on a page) more thought—and perhaps more complicated feelings.
LYRIC POETRY

What Is a Lyric Poem?

Here is a rough definition of a lyric as it is written today: a short poem expressing the thoughts and feelings of a single speaker. Often a poet will write a lyric in the first person (“I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree”), but not always. A lyric can also be in the first person plural, as in Paul Laurence Dunbar’s “We Wear the Mask” (page 322). Or, a lyric might describe an object or recall an experience without the speaker’s ever bringing himself or herself into it. (For an example of such a lyric, one in which the poet refrains from saying “I,” see Theodore Roethke’s “Root Cellar” on page 86 or Gerard Manley Hopkins’s “Pied Beauty” on page 90.)

Perhaps because, rightly or wrongly, some people still think of lyrics as lyre-strumming, they expect a lyric to be an outburst of feeling, somewhat resembling a song, at least containing musical elements such as rime, rhythm, or sound effects. Such expectations are fulfilled in “The Lake Isle of Innisfree,” that impassioned lyric full of language rich in sound. Many contemporary poets, however, write short poems in which they voice opinions or complicated feelings—poems that no reader would dream of trying to sing.

But in the sense in which we use it, lyric will usually apply to a kind of poem you can easily recognize. Here, for instance, are two lyrics. They differ sharply in subject and theme, but they have traits in common: both are short, and (as you will find) both set forth one speaker’s definite, unmistakable feelings.

Robert Hayden (1913–1980)

Those Winter Sundays

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached
from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him.

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
and slowly I would rise and dress,
fearing the chronic angers of that house,

Speaking indifferently to him, who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
Questions
1. Jot down a brief paraphrase of this poem. In your paraphrase, clearly show what the speaker finds himself remembering.
2. What are the speaker’s various feelings? What do you understand from the words chronic anger and austere?
3. With what specific details does the poem make the past seem real?
4. What is the subject of Hayden’s poem? How would you state its theme?

Adrienne Rich (b. 1929)

Aunt Jennifer’s Tigers 1951

Aunt Jennifer’s tigers prance across a screen,
Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.
They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.

Aunt Jennifer’s fingers fluttering through her wool
Find even the ivory needle hard to pull.
The massive weight of Uncle’s wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer’s hand.

When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
The tigers in the panel that she made
Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

Compare
“Aunt Jennifer’s Tigers” with Adrienne Rich’s critical comments on the poem reprinted in the “Writing Effectively” section at the end of this chapter.

NARRATIVE POETRY

Although a lyric sometimes relates an incident, or like “Those Winter Sundays” draws a scene, it does not usually relate a series of events. That happens in a narrative poem, one whose main purpose is to tell a story.

Narrative poetry dates back to the Babylonian Epic of Gilgamesh (composed before 2000 B.C.) and Homer’s epics the Iliad and the Odyssey (composed before 700 B.C.). It may well have originated much earlier. In England and Scotland, storytelling poems have long been popular; in the late Middle Ages, ballads—or storytelling songs—circulated widely. Some, such as “Sir Patrick Spence” and “Bonny Barbara Allan,” survive in our day, and folk singers sometimes perform them.

Evidently the art of narrative poetry invites the skills of a writer of fiction: the ability to draw characters and settings, to engage attention, to shape a plot. Needless to say, it calls for all the skills of a poet as well. In the English language today, lyrics seem more plentiful than other kinds of poetry. Although there has recently been a revival of interest in writing narrative poems, they have a far smaller audience than the readership enjoyed by long verse narratives, such as Henry Wadsworth Longfellow’s Evangeline and Alfred, Lord Tennyson’s Idylls of the King, in the nineteenth century.

Anonymous (traditional Scottish ballad)

Sir Patrick Spence
The king sits in Dumferling town,
Drinking the blude-reid wine:

“O what will I get guid sailor
To sail this schip of mine?”

Up and spak an elden knicht,*
Sac at the kings rich kyne:

“Sir Patrick Spence is the best sailor
That sails upon the se.”

The king has written a braid letter,
And signed it wi’ his hand,
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spence,
Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick red,
A loud lauch laucht he;

The next line that Sir Patrick red,
The teir blinded his ee.

“O wha” is this has don this deid,
This ill deid don to me,
To send me out this time o’ the yeir,
To sail upon the se!

“Mak haste, mak haste, my mirry men all,
Our guid schip sails the morne.”

“O say na sae,” my master deir,
For I feir a deadlie storme.

“Late late yestreen I saw the new moon,
Wi’ the auld moone in hir arme,
And I feir, I feir, my deir master,
That we will cum to hame.”

O our Scots nobles wer richt laith*
To weet* their cok-heid scheudie,*
Bot lang owre* a’ the play wer playd,
Their hats they swam abone.*

O lang, lang may their ladies sic,
Wi’ their fans into their hand,
Or ere* they se Sir Patrick Spence
Cum sailing to the land.

O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi’ their gold kems* in their hair,
Haf owre, haf owre to Aberdour,
It’s fiftie fadom deip,
And thair lies guid Sir Patrick Spence,
Wi’ the Scots lords at his feit.

SIR PATRICK SPENCE. 9 braid: Broad, but broad in what sense? Among guesses are plain-spoken, official, and on wide paper.

Questions
1. That the king drinks “blude-reid wine” (line 2)—what meaning do you find in that detail? What does it hint, or foreshadow?
2. What do you make of this king and his motives for sending Spence and the Scots lords into an impending storm? Is he a fool, is he cruel and inconsiderate, is he deliberately trying to drown Sir Patrick and his crew, or is it impossible for us to know? Let your answer depend on the poem alone, not on anything you read into it.
3. Comment on this ballad’s methods of storytelling. Is the story told too briefly for us to care what happens to Spence and his men, or are there any means by which the poet makes us feel compassion for them? Do you resent the lack of a detailed account of the shipwreck?
4. Lines 25–28—the new moon with the old moon in her arm—have been much admired as poetry. What does this stanza contribute to the story as well?

Robert Frost (1874–1963)

“Out, Out”—

The buzz-saw snarled and rattled in the yard
And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
And from there those that lifted eyes could count
Five mountain ranges one behind the other
Under the sunset far into Vermont.
And the saw snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled,
As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
And nothing happened: day was all but done.
Call it a day, I wish they might have said
To please the boy by giving him the half hour
That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
His sister stood beside them in her apron
To tell them “Supper.” At the word, the saw,
As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
Leaped out at the boy’s hand, or seemed to leap—
He must have given the hand. However it was,
Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
The boy’s first outcry was a rueful laugh,
As he swung toward them holding up the hand
Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
Since he was old enough to know, big boy
Doing a man’s work, though a child at heart—
He saw all spoiled. “Don’t let him cut my hand off—

So. But the hand was gone already.
The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
No one believed. They listened at his heart.
Little—less—nothing—and that ended it.
No more to build on there. And they, since they
Were not the one dead: turned to their affairs.

“Out, Out”—The title of this poem echoes the words of Shakespeare’s Macbeth on receiving news that his queen is dead: “Out, out, brief candle! Life’s but a walking shadow, a poor player / That struts and frets his hour upon the stage / And then is heard no more. It is a tale / Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, / Signifying nothing” (Macbeth 5.5.13–28).

Questions
1. How does Frost make the buzz-saw appear sinister? How does he make it seem, in another way, like a friend?
2. What do you make of the people who surround the boy—the “they” of the poem? Who might they be? Do they seem to you concerned and compassionate, cruel, indifferent, or what?
3. What does Frost’s reference to Macbeth contribute to your understanding of “Out, Out”—? How would you state the theme of Frost’s poem?
4. Set this poem side by side with “Sir Patrick Spence.” How does “Out, Out”— resemble that medieval folk ballad in subject, or differ from it? How is Frost’s poem similar or different in its way of telling a story?

DRAMATIC POETRY

A third kind of poetry is dramatic poetry, which presents the voice of an imaginary character (or characters) speaking directly, without any additional narration by the author.

A dramatic poem, according to T. S. Eliot, does not consist of “what the poet would say in his own person, but only what he can say within the limits of one imaginary character addressing another imaginary character.” Strictly speaking, the term dramatic poetry describes any verse written for the stage (and until a few centuries ago most playwrights, like Shakespeare and Molière, wrote their plays mainly in verse).

Dramatic Monologue

The term dramatic poetry most often refers to the dramatic monologue, a poem written as a speech made by a character (other than the author) at some decisive moment. A dramatic monologue is usually addressed by the speaker to some other character who remains silent. If the listener replies, the poem becomes a dialogue (such as Thomas Hardy’s “The Ruined Maid” on page 59) in which the story unfolds in the conversation between two speakers.

The Victorian poet Robert Browning, who developed the form of the dramatic monologue, liked to put words in the mouths of characters who were suspiciously nasty, weak, reckless, or crazy: see, for instance, Browning’s “Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister” (page 403), in which the speaker is an obsessively proud and jealous monk.

The dramatic monologue has been a popular form among American poets, including Edwin Arlington Robinson, Robert Frost, Ezra Pound, Randall Jarrell, Sylvia Plath, and David Vann.
anything under the sun. Like Dyer, John Milton described sick sheep in "Lycidas," a poem few readers have thought unpoetic:

The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed.
But, swol'n with wind and the rank mist they draw,
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread...

What makes Milton's lines better poetry than Dyer's is, among other things, a difference in attitude. Sick sheep to Dyer mean the loss of a few shillings and pence; to Milton, whose sheep stand for English Christendom, they mean a moral catastrophe.

WRITING EFFECTIVELY

Adrienne Rich on Writing

Recalling "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers"

I know that my style was formed first by male poets: by the men I was reading as an undergraduate—Frost, Dylan Thomas, Donne, Auden, MacNeice, Stevens, Yeats. What I chiefly learned from them was craft. But poems are like dreams: in them you put what you don't know you know. Looking back at poems I wrote before I was 21, I'm startled because beneath the conscious craft are glimpses of the split I even then experienced between the girl who wrote poems, who defined herself in writing poems, and the girl who was to define herself by her relationships with men. "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers," written while I was a student, looks with deliberate detachment at this split. In writing this poem, composed and apparently cool as it is, I thought I was creating a portrait of an imaginary woman. But this woman suffers from the opposition of her imagination, worked out in tapestry, and her life-style, "ringed with ordeals she was mastered by." It was important to me that Aunt Jennifer was a person as distinct from myself as possible—distanced by the formalism of the poem, by its objective, observant tone—even by putting the woman in a different generation.

In those years formalism was part of the strategy—like asbestos gloves, it allowed me to handle materials I couldn't pick up bare-handed.

From "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision"

THINKING ABOUT PARAPHRASING

A poet takes pains to choose each word of a poem for both its sound and its exact shade of meaning. Since a poem's full effect is so completely wedded to its exact wording, some would argue, paraphrasing would be meaningless. But in a different way, paraphrase is the poet's invention, a new language that gives shape to the poem's bottom line. It requires attention to the whole structure of a poem, and to the poem's diction. It is a discipline that reveals the poem's body and its soul.
and pieces, Cummings suggests the flexibility of language and conveys a need to break out of customary ways of using words to define experience. As the preceding discussion illustrates, defining what a poem is (and is almost impossible. It is true that most poems, particularly those divided into stanzas, look like poems, and it is also true that poems tend to be written in compressed language. Beyond this, however, what makes a poem a poem is a matter of degree rather than a question of whether or not it conforms to a set of rules. A poem is likely to use more imagery, figurative language, rhyme, and so on than a prose piece—but, then again, it may not.

Reading Poetry

Many readers say they do not like poetry because they find it obscure or intimidating. One reason some people have difficulty reading poetry is that it tends to present information in subtle (and therefore potentially confusing) ways; it does not immediately “get to the point” as journalistic articles or business letters do. One could certainly argue that by contrasting experience, poetry actually “gets to the point” in ways—and to degrees—that other kinds of writing do not. Even so, some readers see poems as an alien form. They have the misconception that poetry is always filled with obscure allusions, complex metrical schemes, and flowery diction. Others, feeling excluded from what they see as its secret language and mysterious structure, approach poetry as something that must be deciphered. Certainly, reading poetry often requires hard work and concentration. Because it is compressed, poetry often omits exposition and explanation; consequently, readers must be willing to take the time to read slowly—to interpret clues and supply missing connections. Many readers are simply not motivated to dig deeply for what they perceive to be uncertain rewards. But not all poems are difficult, and even those that are difficult are often well worth the effort. (For specific suggestions about how to read poetry, see Chapter 12.)

Recognizing Kinds of Poetry

Most poems are either narrative poems, which recount a story, or lyric poems, which communicate a speaker’s mood, feelings, or state of mind.

Narrative Poetry

Though any brief poem that tells a story, such as Edwin Arlington Robinson’s “Richard Cory” (p. 827), may be considered a narrative poem, the two most familiar forms of narrative poetry are the epic and the ballad.
Browning's "My Last Duchess," in which the poet creates a Renaissance Italian duke whose words reveal much more about himself than the aristocratic speaker intends.

Robert Browning (1812-1889)

My Last Duchess

_Ferrara_

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now; Frà Pandolfo's hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Frà Pandolfo" by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned (since none puts by
The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)
And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
How such a glance came there; so, not the first
Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only, called that spot
Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps
Frà Pandolfo chanced to say, "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat." Such stuff
Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had
A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked what' er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.
Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the West,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving speech,
Or blush, at least. She thanked men,—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—(which I have not)—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let
Herself belessened so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,

—E'en then would I be some stooping; and I choose Never to stoop. Can, sir, she smiled, no doubt, Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile! This grew; I gave commands;
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below, then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

My LAST DUCHESS. Ferrara, a city in northern Italy, is the scene. Browning may have modeled his speaker after Alonzo, Duke of Ferrara (1533-1598). 3 Frà Pandolfo and 56 Claus of Innsbruck: fictitious names of artists.

Questions

1. Whom is the Duke addressing? What is this person's business in Ferrara?
2. What is the Duke's opinion of his last Duchess's personality? Do we see her character differently?
3. If the Duke was unhappy with the Duchess's behavior, why didn't he make his displeasure known? Cite a specific passage to explain his reticence.
4. How much do we know about the fate of the last Duchess? Would it help our understanding of the poem to know more?
5. Does Browning imply any connection between the Duke's art collection and his attitude toward his wife?

DIDACTIC POETRY

More fashionable in former times was a fourth variety of poetry, didactic poetry: a poem written to state a message or teach a body of knowledge. In a lyric, a speaker may express sadness; in a didactic poem, he or she may explain that sadness is inherent in life. Poems that impart a body of knowledge, such as Ovid's Art of Love and Lucretius's On the Nature of Things, are didactic. Such instructive poetry was favored especially by classical Latin poets and by English poets of the eighteenth century. In _The Fleece_ (1757), John Dyer celebrated the British woolen industry and included practical advice on raising sheep:

In cold still soils the bleaters oft complain
Of gouty ails, by shepherds termed the halt:
Those let the neighboring fold or ready crook
Detail, and p. into their cloven feet
Corrosive drugs, deep-searching arsenic,
Dry alum, verdigris, or vitriol keen.

One might agree with Dr. Johnson's comment on Dyer's effort: "The subject, Sir, cannot be made poetical." But it may be argued that the subject of didactic poetry...
Presentation Rubric

Evaluating Student Presentations

Developed by Information Technology Evaluation Services, NC Department of Public Instruction

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>1</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>4</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td>Audience cannot understand presentation because there is no sequence of information.</td>
<td>Audience has difficulty following presentation because student jumps around.</td>
<td>Student presents information in logical sequence which audience can follow.</td>
<td>Student presents information in logical, interesting sequence which audience can follow.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Subject Knowledge</td>
<td>Student does not have grasp of information; student cannot answer questions about subject.</td>
<td>Student is uncomfortable with information and is able to answer only rudimentary questions.</td>
<td>Student is at ease with expected answers to all questions, but fails to elaborate.</td>
<td>Student demonstrates full knowledge (more than required) by answering all class questions with explanations and elaboration.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Graphics</td>
<td>Student uses superfluous graphics or no graphics</td>
<td>Student occasionally uses graphics that rarely support text and presentation.</td>
<td>Student's graphics relate to text and presentation.</td>
<td>Student's graphics explain and reinforce screen text and presentation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mechanics</td>
<td>Student's presentation has four or more spelling errors and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td>Presentation has three misspellings and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td>Presentation has no more than two misspellings and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td>Presentation has no misspellings or grammatical errors.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eye Contact</td>
<td>Student reads all of report with no eye contact.</td>
<td>Student occasionally uses eye contact, but still reads most of report.</td>
<td>Student maintains eye contact most of the time but frequently returns to notes.</td>
<td>Student maintains eye contact with audience, seldom returning to notes.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Elocution</td>
<td>Student mumbles, incorrectly pronounces words, and speaks too quietly for students in the back of class to hear.</td>
<td>Student's voice is low. Student incorrectly pronounces terms. Audience members have difficulty hearing presentation.</td>
<td>Student's voice is clear. Student pronounces most words correctly. Most audience members can hear presentation.</td>
<td>Student uses a clear voice and correct, precise pronunciation of terms so that all audience members can hear presentation.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total Points:
Lesson Plan
(SAP)

Course: Poetry 1
Credit Hour: 2

Study Program: English
Code: ING 208

Faculty: Arts and Languages
Docent: Dr. Kurnia Ningsih, M.A.
: Delvi Wahyuni, S.S., M.A.

Learning Outcomes

Main Competence:
Upon the completion of the course, students are expected to be able appreciate poetry, especially the ones written in English

Supporting Competence:
Students are able to identify the formal qualities or elements of poetry

Soft skills/Character: Students are endowed with the ability to collaborate with others; express their opinion; show high commitment and passion in what they are doing; read between the lines and think critically.

Topics:
1. Speaker
2. Words
3. Figurative Languages
   • Metaphor and Simile,
   • Personification, apostrophe, overstatement, understatement, metonymy, synecdoche, paradox, and pun.
4. Imagery
5. Irony and Tone
6. Sound and Rhythm

Sap2poetry12012
Lesson Plan

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Stage</th>
<th>Lecturer’s Activities</th>
<th>Students’ activities</th>
<th>Assessment</th>
<th>Media</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>1. Explain the overview of lesson in meeting 6-13&lt;br&gt;2. Explain the benefit students can gain from their understanding of the formal qualities or elements of poetry&lt;br&gt;3. Explain the competences they should achieve by the end of meeting 13</td>
<td>Listen to the lecture</td>
<td>Students led presentation on the elements of poetry assigned to them.</td>
<td>Syllabus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Presentation</td>
<td>1. Read “Hawk Roosting” aloud&lt;br&gt;2. Activate students’ background knowledge on the speaker of a poem by asking them to guess who the “I” in the poem might be.&lt;br&gt;3. Listen to and write down students’ response on the whiteboard.&lt;br&gt;4. Elicits to students about the difference between the poets and the character (person or voice or persona or mask) they use in their poem&lt;br&gt;5. Read “Cargoes”&lt;br&gt;6. Explain to students the importance</td>
<td>Listen to the recital&lt;br&gt;Respond to the lecturer&lt;br&gt;Listen to the lecture and work to figure out who the speaker of the poem assigned.</td>
<td>A 1-2 pages device paper which is due to the end of meeting 13.</td>
<td>Whiteboard</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>of words and their meaning in poetry. (denotative and connotative meaning of words). 7. Tutor students how to dig out words’ connotative meaning through context, especially those available in the text or things around the text 8. Read “The Eagle” aloud 9. Explain to students figure of speech or figurative languages used in poetry a. Metaphor and simile b. personification apostrophe, overstatement, understatement, metonymy, synecdoche, paradox, and pun. 10. Read “Embrace” aloud 11. Explain the use of image in poetry and types of imagery commonly grouped. After that the lecture will tutor them to find a. visual imagery b. audio imagery c. tactile imagery d. other sensory experiences.</td>
<td>Working to find connotative meaning of specific words in poem assigned to them Listen to the recital Listen to the lecture Students work to find figure of speech just explained in poems assigned to them. Listen to the recital Listen to the lecture Work to find out sensory experience or imagery describe in poems assigned to them.</td>
<td>Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance. PowerPoint slides Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance. PowerPoint slides Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
11. Read “Making it in Poetry” aloud
   12. Explain that poetry employs Irony, a manner of speaking that describes discrepancy.
13. Explain to students about “tone” in poetry. Elicit from them some range of adjective that can describe the tone of the poem.
14. Read “We Real Cool” aloud or play the audio tape of it.
15. Elicit from them that in poetry sound could carry great weight (meaningful).
16. Tutor them in:
   a. alliteration and assonance
   b. onomatopoeia
   c. rime
17. Elicit to students that poetry also explores rhythm, the hearth of all natural phenomena.
18. Tutor them to recognize metric system in poetry.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PowerPoint slides</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PowerPoint slides</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PowerPoint slides</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Assessment Rubric:

1. Presentation rubric (evaluating students presentation) adopted from http://www.ncsu.edu/~r~idlink/rub.~res.html (see appendix)

References:

Closing

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>19. Close the session.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>a.</td>
<td>Ask students questions on topics which have been covered</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>b.</td>
<td>Respond to students’ answer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>c.</td>
<td>Assign then to be prepared for student led presentation which will be held in the 12th and 13th week on the elements of poetry</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Respond to the questions
Appendices:
1. PowerPoint slides print outs
2. Photocopied material forwarded to students in advance
3. Rubric to evaluate students’ presentation & essay

Appendices:
4. PowerPoint slides print outs
5. Photocopied material forwarded to students in advance
Formal qualities of Poetry
Delvi Wahyuni

Speaker
- Most of us can tell the difference between persons we meet in real life and those who inhabit work of art.
- Some are unable to do it.
- Poetry readers tend to equate the poet with the voice in the poem.
- Consider this:

Speaker
- An inscription on a grave stone of a baby
  Since I have been so quickly done for
  I wonder what I was begun for.
- It is impossible that the dead baby is the poet.
- So, the speaker in a poem is the persona, a fictitious character, a creation, a mask.
- Speaker's job is to describe events, feelings and ideas to readers.
Words, words, words

- Every word has at least one denotation or definition in the dictionary.
- A word also has some connotations or overtones, suggestions and additional meaning that it gains from all the context in which we have met in the past.

Words, words, words

Thus, a word can say and at the same time suggest.

E.g., an anonymous Victorian jingle

Here’s a little ditty that you really ought to know:

Horses “sweat” and men “perspire” but ladies only “glow.”

Figurative Languages

- Poetry is not necessary the sole user of figurative languages.
- Day-to-day conversation sometimes also uses this kind of language.
- We exaggerate; we liken something with something else; we give inanimate object human-like qualities, etc
Simile
- It is a comparison of two things
- Indicative words: like, as, than, resembles.
- Simile describe similarities, however things being compared must be dissimilar in kind.
  E.g.
  - Your fingers are like sausage
  - Her eyes resemble northern stars.

Metaphor
- It is a statement that one thing is another thing.
  - Your fingers are sausages
- Implied metaphor: one that uses neither a connective nor the verb to be
  - My love has red petals and sharp thorns.
- Mixed metaphor:
  - when there is a string of stale metaphor in the poem.
  - When the poet mixes different metaphor in the poem.

Personification
- It is a figure of speech in which a thing, an animal, or an abstract term (truth, nature) is made human.
  - The wind
    The wind stood up and gave a shout.
    He whistled on his fingers and
    Kicked the withered leaves about
    And thumped the branches with his hand
    And said he'd kill and kill,
    And so he will and so he will.
Apostrophe
- A way of addressing someone or something invisible or not ordinarily spoken to, e.g. an absent person or historical figures
- An “O” may be put in front of apostrophe to announce a serious and lofty tones.
- It usually goes hand in hand with personification.
- E.g. “Return Delight”
- “O, moon!”

Overstatement and Understatement
- Overstatement or hyperbole: Emphasis with exaggeration to achieve certain effect.
  - Saying more than is meant
  - “Every time I shake, some skinny gal loses her home”
- Understatement: Implying more than is said
  - Saying less than is meant
  - “for the destruction ice! Is also great/And would suffice”

Metonymy and Synecdoche
- Metonymy: the name of a thing is for that of another closely associated with it.
  - “The White House decided”
- Synecdoche: the substitution of the part for the whole.
  - “Give us today our daily bread”
Paradox

- It occurs in a statement that at first strikes us as self-contradictory but that on reflection makes some sense.
- Consider how the Blind Milton describe his experience of seeing his dead wife in a dream:

  \[\text{But oh, as to embrace me she inclined,}\\ \text{I wake, she fled, and day brought back my night.}\]

Pun

- Complete term: paronomasia or play on words
- It reminds us of another word or other words of similar or identical sound but of very different denotation
  - The bigness of canon is skillful.

Imagery

- It's better to present one Image in a lifetime than to produce voluminous works (Ezra Pound)

  \[\text{In a Station of the Metro}\\ \text{The apparition of these faced in the crowd:}\\ \text{Petals on a wet, black bough}\]
Imagery

- A word or sequence of words that refers to any sensory experience.
- Visual imagery: sight
- Auditory imagery: sound
- Tactile imagery: touch
- Odor, taste, bodily sensation like pain, the prickling of gooseflesh, the quenching of thirst, the perception of something cold

Imagery

- Imagery is helpful in establishing the atmosphere of mood of the poem through connotation or emotional association it might engender.
- Synesthesia:
  - A special use of imagery when one sense is described in a way that is more appropriate for another
    - E.g. When a sound is described with color.

Irony

- It's a manner of speaking that implies a discrepancy.
- Or, discrepancy occurs between two layers of meaning
- Skillfully used, irony is a powerful means to make pointed comment on a situation or of manipulating a reader's emotion
- It is used to see the difference between the poet and the words of a fictitious character.
In order to make irony work, readers must be able to see the disparity between what is said and what is meant.

Observe this poem:

Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind.
Because your lover threw wild hands toward the

And the frightened steed ran alone,
Do not weep.
War is kind

Types of irony
- Ironic point of view
- Dramatic irony
- Ironic point of view
- Situational irony
- Verbal irony
  - Sarcasm

Tone
- It is how the poem addresses its readers:
  - Cocksure, humble, sad, glad,
- What is the tone of a poem?
- What attitude does the poet take toward a theme or the subject conveyed in her poem
- Affectionate, hostile, earnest, playful, sarcastic, joyful, playful, serious, comic, intimate, formal, relaxed, condescending, or ironic
Tone

- For poets, conveying the tone to readers is quite a challenging job.
- So, they use the help of some techniques like rhyme, meter, word choice, sentence structure, figure of speech and imagery.

Sound

- Sound as meaning:
- The sound must be seen as an echo to the sense (Alexander Pope)
- Sound is helpful in producing effect the poet with the reader have
  - Euphony: when the sound of words working together with meaning pleases mind and ear.
  - Cacophony: a harsh, discordant effect (also for the sake of meaning).

Sound

- Onomatopoeia
- Alliteration and assonance
- Rime:
  - Exact rime
  - Slant rime
  - Consonance
  - End rime
  - Masculine
  - Feminine
  - Eye rime
Rhythm
- It is the regular recurrence of sound.
- We use rhythm when we speak to emphasis something.
- We also pause.
- Some poems are grouped based on their rhythm.
- Poetic rhythm: the repetition of stresses and pauses

Meter
- It is the recurrence of regular units of stressed and unstressed syllables.
- Meter must be appropriate for ideas expressed by the poem, and it should help to create a suitable poem.
- E.g.
  - A light, skipping is not suitable for an elegy, a poem about death
  - A slow heavy rhythm is not appropriate for an epigram, a short poem that makes a pointed comment in an unusually clear and witty manner

Scansion is the art of scanning the meter of the verse
Prosody is the study of metrical structures in poetry
Foot is a group of syllable with a fixed pattern of stressed and unstressed syllable.

Types of meter
- iambic
- Anapestic
- Trochaic
- Dactylic
- The raising meters
- The falling meters
- Accentual meters
APPENDICES AND PHOTOCOPIED MATERIAL WHICH SERVES AS BOTH TEACHING MATERIAL AND STUDENTS’ WORK SHEET
Part II

Poetry Formal Qualities/Element of

- Poetry
- Formal Qualities
- Element
- Poetry
- Voice
- Words
- Imagery
- Sound
- Tone
- Irony
- Figurative Languages
- Rhythm
THE PERSON IN THE POEM

The tone of a poem, we said, is like tone of voice in that both communicate feelings. Still, this comparison raises a question: when we read a poem, whose "voice" speaks to us? "The poet's" is one possible answer; and in the case of many a poem that answer may be right. Reading Anne Bradstreet's "The Author to Her Book," we can be reasonably sure that the poet speaks of her very own book, and of her own experiences. In order to read a poem, we seldom need to read a poet's biography; but in truth there are certain poems whose full effect depends upon our knowing at least a fact or two of the poet's life. Here is one such poem.

Natasha Trethewey (b. 1966)

White Lies

The lies I could tell, when I was growing up light-bright, near-white, high-yellow, red-lynned
in a black place, were just white lies.

I could easily tell the white folks that we lived uptown, not in that pink and green shanty-fed shotgun section along the tracks. I could act like my homemade dresses came straight out the window of Maison Blanche. I could even keep quiet, quiet as kept, like the time a white girl said (squeezing my hand), "Now we have three of us in this class."

But I paid for it every time
Mama found out.
She laid her hands on me,
then washed out my mouth with ivory soap. This is to purify, she said,
and cleanse your lying tongue.
Believing her, I swallowed suds thinking they'd work from the inside out.

Through its pattern of vivid color imagery, Trethewey's poem tells of a black child light enough to "pass for white" in a society that was still extremely race-sensitive. But knowing the author's family background gives us a deeper insight into the levels of meaning in the poem. Trethewey was born in Mississippi in 1966, at a time when her mother was a young girl.
record the race of her father—who was white and had been born in Nova Scotia—appeared the word “Canadian” (although her parents divorced before she began grade school, she remained extremely close to both of them). Trethewey has said of her birth certificate: "Something is left out of the official record that way. The irony isn't lost on me. Even in documenting myself as a person there is a little fiction." “White Lies” succeeds admirably on its own, but these biographical details allow us to read it as an even more complex meditation on issues of racial definition and personal identity in America.

The leaves will whisper there of her, and some,
There where the vines cling crimson on the wall,
Like flying words, will strike you as they fall;
But go, and if you listen she will call.

No, there is not a dawn in eastern skies
To rift the fiery night that's in your eyes;
But there, where western glooms are gathering,
The dark will end the dark, if anything;
God says Himself with every leaf that flies,
And hell is more than half of paradise.
No, there is not a dawn in eastern skies—
In eastern skies.

Out of a grave I come to tell you this,
Out of a grave I come to quench the kiss
That flames upon your forehead with a glow
That blinds you to the way that you must go.
Yes, there is yet one way to where she is,
Bitter, but one that faith may never miss.
Out of a grave I come to tell you this—
To tell you this.

There is the western gate, Luke Havergal,
There are the crimson leaves upon the wall.

Questions
1. Who is the speaker of the poem? What specific details does the author reveal about the speaker?
2. What does the speaker ask Luke Havergal to do?
3. What do you understand "the western gate" to be?
4. Would you advise Luke Havergal to follow the speaker's advice? Why or why not?

No literary law decrees that the speaker in a poem even has to be human. Good poems have been uttered by clouds, pebbles, clocks, and cats. Here is a poem spoken by a hawk, a dramatic monologue that expresses the animal's thoughts and attitudes in a way consciously designed to emphasize how different its worldview is from a human perspective.

Ted Hughes (1930-1998)

Hawk Roosting

[Hit in the top of the wood, my eyes closed.
Inaction, no falsifying dream.
Between my hooked head and hooked feet,
Or in sleep rehearse perfect kills and eat.
The convenience of the high trees!
The air's buoyancy and the sun's ray]
My feet are locked upon the rough bark.
It took the whole of Creation
To produce my foot, my each feather:
Now I hold Creation in my foot
Or fly up, and revolve it all slowly—
I kill where I please because it is all mine.
There is no sophistry in my body:
My manners are tearing off heads—
The allotment of death.
For the one path of my flight is direct
Through the bones of the living
No arguments assert my right:
The sun is behind me.
Nothing has changed since I began.
My eye has permitted no change.
I am going to keep things like this.

Questions

1. Find three observations the hawk makes about its world that a human would probably not make. What do these remarks tell us about the bird's character?
2. In what ways does Ted Hughes create an unrealistic portrayal of the hawk's true mental powers? What statements in the poem would an actual hawk be unlikely to make? Do these passages add anything to the poem's impact? What would be lost if they were omitted?

Here is a poem in which the speaker is something even more remote from humanity, something we ordinarily assume to have no thoughts or attitudes at all, but whose monologue offers an even more pointed contrast with human values.

Suji Kwock Kim (b. 1968)

Monologue for an Onion
2003

I don't mean to make you cry.
I mean nothing, but this has not kept you
From peeling away my body, layer by layer,
The tears clouding your eyes as the table fills
With husks, cut flesh, all the debris of pursuit.
Poor deluded human: you seek my heart.
Hunt all you want. Beneath each skin of mine
Lies another skin: I am pure onion—pure union
Of outside and in, surface and secret core.
Look at you, chopping and weeping, idiot.
Is this the way you go through life, your mind
A useless knife, driven by your furious heart.
SAYING AND SUGGESTING

To name an object is to take away three-fourths of the pleasure given by a poem. . . .

To suggest it, that is the ideal.

—STÉPHANE MALLARME

DENOTATION AND CONNOTATION

Every word has at least one denotation: a meaning as defined in a dictionary. But the English language has many a common word with so many denotations that a reader may need to think twice to see what it means in a specific context. The noun field, for instance, can denote a piece of ground, a sports arena, the scene of a battle.

That some words denote the same thing but have sharply different connotations is pointed out in this anonymous Victorian jingle:

Here's a little ditty that you really ought to know:

Horses "sweat" and men "perspire," but ladies only "gloze."

DENOTATION AND CONNOTATION

Every word has at least one denotation: a meaning as defined in a dictionary. But the English language has many a common word with so many denotations that a reader may need to think twice to see what it means in a specific context. The noun field, for instance, can denote a piece of ground, a sports arena, the scene of a battle.

A word also has connotations: overtones or suggestions of additional meaning that it gains from all the contexts in which we have met it in the past. The word skeleton, according to a dictionary, denotes "the bony framework of a human being or other vertebrate animal, which supports the flesh and protects the organs." But by its associations, the word can rouse thoughts of war, of disease and death, or (possibly) of one's plans to go to medical school. Think, too, of the difference between "Old Doc Jones" and "Theodore E. Jones, M.D." In the mind's eye, the former appears in his shirtsleeves; the latter has a gold nameplate on his door.

To write so clearly that they might bring "all things as near the mathematical plainness" as possible—that was the goal of scientists, according to Bishop Thomas Sprat, who lived in the seventeenth century. Such an effort would seem bound to fail, because words, unlike numbers, are ambiguous indicators. Although it may have troubled Bishop Sprat, the tendency of a word to have multiplicity of meaning rather than mathematical plainness opens broad avenues to poetry.

The terms druggist, pharmacist, and apothecary all denote the same occupation, but apothecaries lay claim to special distinction.

Poets aren't the only people who care about the connotations of language. Advertisers know that connotations make money. Nowadays many automobile dealers advertise their secondhand cars not as "used" but as "pre-owned," as if fearing that "used car" would connote an old heap with soiled upholstery and mysterious engine troubles. "Pre-owned," however, suggests that the previous owner has kindly taken the trouble of breaking in the car for you. Not long ago prune-packers, alarmed by a slump in sales, sponsored a survey to determine the connotations of prunes in the public consciousness. Asked, "What do you think of when you hear the word prunes?" most people replied, "dried up," "wrinkled," or "constipated." Dismayed, the packers hired an advertising agency to create a new image for prunes, in hopes of inducing new connotations. Soon, advertisements began to show prunes in brightly colored settings, in the company of bikinied bathing beauties.

In imaginative writing, connotations are as crucial as they are in advertising. Consider this sentence: "A new brand of journalism is being born, or spawned" (Dwight Macdonald writing in the New York Review of Books). The last word, by its associations with fish and crustaceans, suggests that this new journalism is scarcely the product of human beings.

Here is a famous poem that groups together things with similar connotations: certain ships and their cargoes. (A quinquireme, by the way, was an ancient Assyrian vessel propelled by sails and oars.)

John Masefield (1878–1967)

Cargoes

Quinquireme of Nineveh from distant Ophir,
Rowing home to haven in sunny Palestine,
With a cargo of ivory,
And apes and peacocks,
Sandalwood, cedarwood, and sweet white wine.

Stately Spanish galleon coming from the Isthmus,
Dipping through the Tropics by the palm-green shores,
With a cargo of diamonds,
Emeralds, amethysts,
Topazes, and cinnamon, and gold minodors.

Dirty British coaster with a salt-caked smoke stack,
Butting through the Channel in the mad March days,
With a cargo of Tyne coal,
Road-rails, pig-lead,
Firewood, iron-ware, and cheap tin trays.

To us, as well as to the poet's original readers, the place-names in the first two stanzas suggest the exotic and faraway. Ophir, a vanished place, may have been in Arabia; according to the Bible, King Solomon sent expeditions there for gold and ivory.

Dirty British coaster with a salt-caked smoke stack,
Butting through the Channel in the mad March days,
With a cargo of Tyne coal,
Road-rails, pig-lead,
Firewood, iron-ware, and cheap tin trays.
Wallace Stevens (1879-1955)

Disillusionment of Ten O'Clock

1923

The houses are haunted
By white night-gowns.
None are green,
Or purple with green rings,
Or green with yellow rings,
Or yellow with blue rings.
None of them are strange,
With socks of lace.
And beaded ceintures.
People are not going
To dream of baloons and periwinkles.
Only, here and there, an old sailor,
Drunk and asleep in his boots,
Catches tigers
In red weather.

Questions

1. What are beaded ceintures? What does the phrase suggest?
2. What contrast does Stevens draw between the old sailor and the new people who live in these houses and the old sailor? What do the connotations of white night-gowns and sailor add to this contrast?
3. What is lacking in these people who wear white night-gowns? Why should the poet's view of them be a "disillusionment"?

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917-2000)

Southeast Corner

1945

The School of Beauty's a tavern now.
The Madam is underground.
Out at Lincoln, among the graves
Her own is early found.
Where the thickest, tallest monument
Cuts grandly into the air.
The Madam lies, contentedly.
Her fortune, too, lies there.
Converted into cool hard steel.
And right red velvet lining;
While over her tan impassivity
Shot silk is shining.

Questions

1. What view of its subject does this poem implicitly take, and through what words is it conveyed?

---

E. E. Cummings (1894-1962)

Fire and Ice

1923

"next to of course god america i love you land of the pilgrims’ and so forth oh say can you see by the dawn’s early my country 'tis of centuries come and go and are no more what of it we should worry in every language even deaf and dumb thy sons acclaim your glorious name by gorry by jingo by gee by gosh by gum why talk of beauty what could be more beautiful than these heroic happy dead who rushed like lions to the roaring slaughter they did not stop to think they died instead then shall the voice of liberty be mute?"

He spoke. And drank rapidly a glass of water

Questions

1. How many allusions in this poem can you identify? What do all the sources of those allusions have in common?
2. Look up the origin of jingo (line 8). Is it used here as more than just a mindless exclamation?
3. Beyond what is actually said, what do the rhetoric of the first thirteen lines and the description in the last one suggest about the author’s intentions in this poem?

Robert Frost (1874-1963)

Epitaph

1923

Some say the world will end in fire,
Some say in ice.
From what I've tasted of desire
I hold with those who favor fire.
But if it had to perish twice,
I think I know enough of hate
To say that for destruction ice
Is also great
And would suffice.

Questions

1. To whom does Frost refer in line 1? In line 2?
2. What connotations of fire and ice contribute to the richness of Frost’s comparison?

Timothy Steele (b. 1948)

Epitaph

1979

Here lies Sir Tact, a diplomatic fellow.
Questions

1. To what famous saying does the poet allude?
2. What are the connotations of golden? Of yellow?

Diane Thiel (b. 1967)
The Minefield

He was running with his friend from town to town.
They were somewhere between Prague and Dresden.

He was fourteen. His friend was faster and knew a shortcut through the fields they could take.

He said there was lettuce growing in one of them, and they hadn't eaten all day. His friend ran a few lengths ahead, like a wild rabbit across the grass, turned his head, looked back once,
and his body was scattered across the field.

My father told us this, one night,
and then continued eating dinner.

He brought them with him—the minefields.
He carried them underneath his good intentions.

He gave them to us—in the volume in the bruises we covered up with sleeves.

In the way we still expect, years and we would have to run on alone with a vision like that on only seconds behind.

Questions

1. In the opening lines of the poem, a seemingly small decision—to take a shortcut and find something to eat—leads to a horrifying result. What does this suggest about the poem's larger view of what life is like?
2. The speaker tells the story of the minefield before letting us know that the other boy was her father. What is the effect of this narrative strategy?
3. How does the image of the melon reinforce the poem's intentions?

Ron Rash (b. 1953)
The Day the Gates Closed

We lose so much in this life.

Shall we seme things stay, she said,

no human sound, the poplars and oaks cut down so even the wind had nothing to rub a whisper from, just silence rising over the valley deep and wide as a glacier.

Questions

1. What do you think the title means, and what does it contribute to your understanding of the poem?
2. How does the first line set a keynote for what follows?
3. What mood is created by the imagery and tone of the poem? Be as specific as possible in your responses.
4. How does the simile of the glacier in the last line tie into the theme?

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-1892)

Tears, Idle Tears

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rue in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn-fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the underworld,
Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge;
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.

Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awakened buds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glittering square;
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

Dear as remembered kisses after death.
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O Death in Life, the days that are no more!

Richard Wilbur (b. 1921)

Love Calls Us to the Things of This World

The eyes open to a cry of pulleys,
And spirited from sleep, the astounded soul
As false dawn,
Outside the open window
The morning air is all awash with angels.
Some are in bed-sheets, some are in blouses,
Some are in smocks; but truly there they are.
Now they are rising together in calm swells
Of halcyon feeling, filling whatever they wear
With the deep joy of their impersonal breathing;
Now they are flying in place, conveying
The terrible speed of their omnipresence, moving
And soaring like white water; and now of a sudden
They swoon down into so rapt a quiet
That nobody seems to be there.

The soul shrinks

From all that it is about to remember,
From the punctual rape of every blessed day,
And cries,
"Oh, let there be nothing on earth but laundry,
Nothing but rosy hands in the rising steam
And clear dances done in the sight of heaven."

Yet, as the sun acknowledges
With a warm look the world's hunks and colors,
The soul descends once more in bitter love
To accept the waking body, saying now
In a changed voice as the man yawns and rises,
"Bring them down from their ruddy gallows;
Let there be clean linen for the backs of thieves;
Let lovers go fresh and sweet to be undone,
And the heaviest nuns walk in a pure floating
Of dark habits,
keeping their difficult balance."

LOVE CALLS US TO THE THINGS OF THIS WORLD. Wilbur claimed that his title was taken from St. Augustine, but in a recent interview he admitted that neither he nor any critic has ever been able to locate the quotation again. Whatever its source, however, the title establishes the poem's central idea that love allows us to return from the divine world of the spirit to the imperfect world of our everyday lives. Wilbur's own comments on the poem appear after the questions that follow here.

Questions
1. What are the angels in line 5? Why does this metaphor seem appropriate to the situation?
2. What is "the punctual rape of every blessed day," Who is being raped? Who or what commits the rape? Why would Wilbur choose this particular word with all its violent associations?
3. Whom or what does the soul love in line 23, and why is that love bitter?
4. Is it merely obesity that makes the nuns' balance "difficult" in the two final lines of the poem? What other "balance" does Wilbur's poem suggest?
5. The soul has two speeches in the poem. How do they differ in tone and imagery?
6. The spiritual world is traditionally considered invisible. What concrete images does Wilbur use to represent the invisible?
I'm Nobody! Who Are You?

(1891)

I'm Nobody! Who are you?
Are you—Nobody—Too?
Then there's a pair of us?
Don't tell! they'd advertise—you know!

How dreary—to be—Somebody!
How public—like a Frog—
To tell one's name—the livelong June—
To an admiring Bog!

The Speaker in the Poem

The speaker in the poem:

The author's careful choice and arrangement of words enable readers to form an impression of the narrator and to decide whether he or she is a sophisticated or unsophisticated, trustworthy or untrustworthy, innocent or experienced. Like fiction, poetry depends on a speaker who describes events, feelings, and ideas to readers. Finding out as much as possible about this speaker can help readers interpret the poem. For example, the speaker in Emily Dickinson's "I'm Nobody! Who Are You?" seems at once shy and playful. The first stanza of the poem suggests that the speaker is a private person, perhaps with little self-esteem. As the poem continues, however, the voice becomes almost defiant. In a sense the speaker's two voices represent two ways of relating to the world. The first voice expresses the private self—internal, isolated, and revealed through metaphor; the second expresses the public self—external, self-centered, and inevitably superficial. Far from being defeated by shyness, the speaker must have chosen her status as "nobody."

One question readers might ask about "I'm Nobody! Who Are You?" is how close the speaker's voice is to the poet's. Readers who conclude that the poem is about the conflict between a poet's public and private responsibilities may be tempted to see the speaker and the poet as one. But this is not necessarily the case. Like the narrator of a short story, the speaker of a poem is a persona, or mask, that the poet assumes. Granted, in some poems little distance exists between the poet and the speaker. Without evidence to support a link between speaker and poet, however, readers should not assume they are one and the same.

In most cases the speaker is quite different from the poet. And even when the speaker's voice conveys the attitude of the poet, it may do so...
Epic poems recount the accomplishments of heroic figures, typically including expansive settings, superhuman feats, and gods and supernatural beings. The language of epic poems tends to be formal, even elevated, and often quite elaborate. Epics span many cultures—from the Odyssey (Greek) to Beowulf (Anglo-Saxon) to The Epic of Gilgamesh (Babylonian). In ancient times, epics were handed down orally; more recently, poets have written literary epics, such as John Milton's 1667 Paradise Lost and Nobel Prize–winning poet Derek Walcott's 1990 Omeros, which follow many of the same conventions.

The ballad is another type of narrative poetry with roots in an oral tradition. Originally intended to be sung, a ballad uses repeated words and phrases, including a refrain, to advance its story. Some—but not all—ballads use the ballad stanza. For examples of traditional ballads in this text, see "Bonny Barbara Allen" (p. 776) and "Western Wind" (p. 777). Dudley Randall's "Ballad of Birmingham" (p. 609) and Gwendolyn Brooks's "The Ballad of Chocolate Mablie" (p. 856) are examples of contemporary ballads.

Lyric Poetry

Like narrative poems, lyric poems take various forms.

An elegy is a poem in which a poet mourns the death of a special person, as in Robert Hayden's "Homage to the Empress of the Blues" (p. 807), about the singer Bessie Smith. Another example of this type is A. E. Housman's "To an Athlete Dying Young" (p. 640).

An ode is a long lyric poem, formal and serious in style, tone, and subject matter. An ode typically has a fairly complex stanzaic pattern, such as the terza rima used by Percy Bysshe Shelley in "Ode to the West Wind" (p. 829). Another ode in this text is "Ode on a Grecian Urn" (p. 813).

An aubade is a poem about morning, usually celebrating the coming of dawn. An example is Philip Larkin's "Aubade" (p. 815).

An occasional poem is written to celebrate a particular event or occasion. An example is Miller Williams's poem for President Clinton's second inaugural in 1997.

A meditation is a lyric poem that focuses on a physical object, using this object as a vehicle for considering larger issues. Edmund Waller's "Lovely Rose" (p. 842) is a meditation.

A pastoral—for example, Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (p. 536)—is a lyric poem that celebrates the simple, idyllic pleasures of country life.

Finally, a dramatic monologue is a poem whose speaker addresses one or more silent listeners, often revealing much more than he or she intends. Robert Browning's "My Last Duchess" (p. 583) and "Porphyria's..."
only indirectly. In "The Chimney Sweeper" (p. 779), for example, William Blake assumes the voice of a child to criticize the system of child labor that existed in eighteenth-century England. Even though the child speaker does not understand the conditions that cause his misery, readers sense the poet's anger as the trusting speaker describes the conditions under which he works. The poet's indignation is especially apparent in the biting line of the last line, in which the victimized speaker innocently assures readers that if all people do their duty, "they need not fear harm."

Sometimes the poem's speaker is anonymous. In this case—is William Carlos Williams's "Red Wheelbarrow" (p. 648), for instance—the first-person voice is absent and the speaker remains outside the poem. Other times, the speaker has a set identity—a king, a beggar, a highwayman, a sheriff, a husband, a wife, a rich man, a chimney sweep, a child, a mythical figure, an explorer, a teacher, a faithless lover, a saint, or even a flower, an animal, or a cloud of earth. Whatever the case, the speaker is not the poet, but rather a creation that the poet uses to convey his or her ideas. (For this reason, poems by a single poet may have very different voices. See Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" [p. 673] and "Morning Song" [p. 599], for example.)

In the following poem, the poet assumes the mask of a fictional character, Gretel from the fairy tale "Hansel and Gretel."

LOUISE GLOCK
(1943—)

Gretel in Darkness
(1971)

This is the world we wanted. All who would have seen us dead Are dead. I hear the witch's cry Break in the moonlight through a sheet of sugar: God rewards.
Her tongue shrivels into gas...

Now, far from women's arms
And memory of women, in our father's hut
We sleep, are never hungry.
Why do I not forget?
My father bars the door, bars harm
From this house, and it is years.

No one remembers. Even you, my brother.
Summer afternoons you look at me as though you meant
To leave, as though it never happened. But I killed for you.
I see armed fires, the spires of that gleaming kiln come back, come back—

Nights I turn to you to hold me but you are not there.
Am I alone? Spies
Hiss in the stillness. Hansel we are there still, and it is real, real,
That black forest, and the fire in earnest.

The speaker in this poem comments on her life in the years after her encounter with the witch in the forest. Speaking to her brother, Gretel observes that they now live in the world they wanted; they live with their mother in her hut, and the witch and the wicked stepmother are dead. Even the memory of the events in the forest haunt Gretel and make it impossible for her to live "happily ever after." The "armed fires," the "gleaming kiln," and the "black forest" break through the "sheet of sugar" that her life has become.

By assuming the persona of Gretel, Glück is able to convey some interesting and complex ideas. On one level, Gretel represents any person who has lived through a traumatic experience. Memories of the event keep breaking through into the present, frustrating her attempts to reestablish her belief in the goodness of the world. The voice we hear is sad, alone, and frightened: "Nights I turn to you to hold me," she says, "but you are not here." Although the murder Gretel committed for her brother was justified, it seems to haunt her. "No one remembers," laments Gretel, not even her brother. At some level, she realizes that by killing the witch she has killed a part of herself, perhaps the part of women that men fear and consequently transform into witches and wicked stepmothers. The world that left after the killing is the father's and the brother's, not hers, and she is now alone in a dark world haunted by the memories of the black forest. In this sense, Gretel—"Now, far from women's arms / And memory of women—may be the voice of all victimized women who, because of men, are against their own best interests—and regret it.

As "Gretel in Darkness" illustrates, a title can identify a poem's speaker, but the speaker's own words can provide much more information. This is the case in the following poem, where Spanish words help to define the poem's frame of reference and to characterize the speaker.

LEONARD ADAME
(1947—)

My Grandmother Would Rock Quietly and Hum
(1973) in her house

she would rock quietly and hum until her swelled hands calmed

in summer
she wore thick stockings sweaters and grey braids

(calmed)

(when “el cheque”¹ came we went to Payless and I laughed greedily
when given a quarter)
mornings, sunlight barely lit

the kitchen and where there were shadows
It was not cold

she quietly rolled flour tortillas—

the “papas”² cracking in hot lard would wake me

she had lost her teeth and when we ate
she had bread.
soaked in “café”³ always her eyes were clear.

and she could see as I cannot yet see—through her eyes
she gave me herself

she would sit and talk:

of her girlhood—
of things strange to me:
México
epidemics relative shot her father’s hopes of this country—

how they sank with cement dust to his insides

now when I go to the old house
the worn spots

by the stove echo of her shuffling and México
still hangs in her fading

calendar pictures

In this poem, the speaker is an adult recalling childhood memories of his grandmother. Spanish words—el cheque, tortillas, papas, and café—identify the speaker as Latino. His easy use of English, his comment that talk of Mexico is strange to him, and his observation that he cannot yet see through his grandmother’s eyes suggest, however, that he is not completely in touch with his ethnic identity. At one level, the grandmother’s nostalgic memories of the speaker’s youth. At another level, she is a symbol of his ties with Mexico, connecting him to the ethnic culture he is trying to recover. The poem ends on an ambivalent note: even though the speaker is able to return to “the old house,” the pictures of Mexico are fading, perhaps suggesting the speaker’s assimilation into mainstream American culture.

Direct statements by the speaker can also help to characterize him. In the poem that follows, the first line of each stanza establishes the identity of the speaker—and defines his perspective.

LANGSTON HUGHES
(1902–1967)

Negro
(1926)

I am a Negro:
Black as the night is black,
Black like the depths of my Africa.

¹ The check.
² Potatoes.
³ Coffee.

581 HUGHES & NEGRO 581

580 Chapter 13 • Voice
I've been a slave:
Caesar told me to keep his door-steps clean.
I brushed the boots of Washington.

I've been a worker:
Under my hand the pyramids arose.
I made mortar for the Woolworth Building.

I've been a singer:
All the way from Africa to Georgia
I carried my sorrow songs.
I made ragtime.

I've been a victim:
The Belgians cut off my hands in the Congo.
They lynch me still in Mississippi.

I am a Negro:
Black as the night is black,
Black like the depths of my Africa.

Here the speaker, identifying himself as "a Negro," assumes each of the roles African-Americans have historically played in Western societies—slave, worker, singer, and victim. By so doing, he gives voice to his ancestors who, by being forced to serve others, were deprived of their identities. By presenting not just their suffering, but also their accomplishments, the speaker asserts his pride in being black. The speaker also implies that the suffering of black people has been caused by economic exploitation. Egyptians, Belgians, and Americans all used black labor to build their societies. In this context, the speaker's implied warning is clear: except for the United States, all the societies that have exploited blacks have declined, and long after these empires have fallen, black people still endure.

In each of the preceding poems, the speaker is alone. The following poem, a dramatic monologue, presents a more complex situation in which the poet creates a complete dramatic scene. The speaker is developed as a character whose distinctive personality is revealed through his words as he addresses a silent listener.

ROBERT BROWNING
(1812-1889)

My Last Duchess (1842)

Ferrara

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now; Fra Pandolf's1 hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Fra Pandolf," by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned (since none puts by
The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)
And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
How such a glance came there; so, not the first
Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only, called that spot
Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps
Fra Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat": such stuff
Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had
A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked what'er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the West,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving speech,
Or blush, at least. She thanked men—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame

1 Fra "Pandolf," a fictive painter.

35. This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—(which I have not)—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let
Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse
—E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt, When'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands,
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below, then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's seif, as I avowed
At starting, is. my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

The speaker is probably Alfonso II, duke of Ferrara, Italy, whose young wife Lucrezia, died in 1561 after only three years of marriage. Shortly after her death, the duke began negotiations to marry again. When the poet opens the poem, the duke is showing a portrait of his late wife to an emissary of an unidentified count who is there to arrange a marriage between the duke and the count’s daughter. The duke remarks that the artist, Prà Pandolf, has caught a certain look upon the duchess’s face. This look aroused the jealousy of the duke, who thought that it should have been for him alone. According to the duke, the duchess’s crime was to have a heart “too soon made glad,” “too easily impressed.” Eventually the duke could stand the situation no longer and lied “gave commands,” and “all smiles stopped together.”

Much of what readers learn about the duke’s state of mind comes from what is implied by his words. As he discusses the painting, the duke unintentionally reveals himself to be obsessively possessive and jealous, referring to “my last Duchess,” “my favor at her breast,” and “my gift to a nine-hundred-years-old name.” He keeps the picture of his late wife.

---

Poems for Further Reading: The Speaker in the Poem

LESLIE MARMON SILKO

(1948)

Where Mountain Lion Lay Down with Deer

(1973)

I climb the black rock mountain stepping from day to day silently.

I smell the wind for my ancestors pale blue leaves crushed wild mountain smell.

Returning up the gray stone cliff where I descended a thousand years ago.

Returning to faded black stone

where mountain lion lay down with deer.

It is better to stay up here watching wind’s reflection

in tall yellow flowers.
The old ones who remember me are gone
the old songs are all forgotten and the story of my birth.
How I danced in snow-frost moonlight distant stars to the end of the Earth,
How I swam away
in freezing mountain water narrow mossy canyon tumbling down out of the mountain out of the deep canyon stone down the memory spilling out into the world.

Reading and Reacting
1. Who is speaking in line 4? In line 9? Can you explain this shift?
2. From where is the speaker returning? What is she trying to recover?
3. Journal Entry The poet is of Native American descent. Is it important for you to know this information about her? How does information about the poet's ancestry affect your interpretation of the poem?
4. Critical Perspective In her 1983 essay "Answering the Deer," Native American poet and critic Paula Gunn Allen observed that the possibility of cultural extinction is a basic reality Native Americans must face. Native American women writers, says Allen, face this fact directly, but with a kind of hope:

The sense of hope... comes about when one has faced ultimate disaster time and time again over the ages and has emerged... stronger and more certain of the endurance of the people, the spirits, and the land from which they both arise and which informs both with life. Transformation, or more directly, metamorphosis, is the oldest tribal ceremonial theme... And it comes once again into use within American Indian poetry of extinction and regeneration that is ultimately the only poetry any contemporary Indian woman can write.

Does Silko's poem address the issue of cultural extinction and the possibility of regeneration or metamorphosis? How?

Related Works: "Two Kinds" (p. 450), "Windigo" (p. 767), "Nikki tion (p. 804), Fences (p. 1347)
We all write poems; it is simply that poets are the ones who write in words.
—John Powles

LITERAL MEANING: WHAT A POEM SAYS FIRST

Although successful as a painter, Edgar Degas found poetry discouragingly hard to write. To his friend, the poet Stéphane Mallarmé, he complained, “What a business! My whole day gone on a blasted sonnet, without getting an inch further... and it isn't ideas! I'm short of... I'm full of them, I've got too many...”

“But Degas,” said Mallarmé, “you can't make a poem with ideas—you make it with words!”

Like the celebrated painter, some people assume that all it takes to make a poem is a bright idea. Poems state ideas, to be sure, and sometimes the ideas are invaluable; and yet the most impressive idea in the world will not make a poem, unless its words are selected and arranged with loving art. Some poets take great pains to find the right word. Unable to fill a two-syllable gap in an unfinished line that went, “The seal's wide...,” Hart Crane paged through an unabridged dictionary. When he reached S, he found the object of his quest in spinazitis: “spray skimmed from the sea by a strong wind.” The word is exact and memorable.

In reading a poem, some people assume that its words can be skipped over rapidly, and they try to leap at once to the poem's general theme. It is as if they fear being thought clods unless they can find huge ideas in the poem (whether or not there are any). Such readers often ignore the literal meanings of words: the ordinary, matter-of-fact sense to be found in a dictionary. (As you will see in the next chapter, “Saying and Suggesting,” words possess not only dictionary meanings—denotations—but also many associations and suggestions—connotations.) Consider the following poem and see what you make of it.

William Carlos Williams (1883-1963)

This Is Just to Say 1934

I have eaten the plums that were in the icebox

and which you were probably saving for breakfast

Forgive me they were delicious so sweet and so cold

Some readers distrust a poem so simple and candid. They think, “What's wrong with me? There has to be more to it than this!” But poems seldom are puzzles in need of solutions. We can begin by accepting the poet's statements, without suspecting the poet of trying to hoodwink us. On later reflection, of course, we might possibly decide that the poem is playfully teasing or being ironic; but Williams gives us no reason to think that. There seems no need to look beyond the literal sense of his words; no profit in speculating that the plums symbolize worldly joys and that the icebox stands for the universe. Clearly, a reader who held such a grand theory would have overlooked (in eagerness to find a significant idea) the plain truth that the poet makes clear to us: that ice-cold plums are a joy to taste.

To be sure, William's small poem is simpler than most poems are; and yet in reading any poem, no matter how complicated, you will do well to reach slowly and reluctantly for a theory to explain it by. To find the general theme of a poem, you first need to pay attention to its words. Recall Yeats's “The Lake Isle of Innisfree” (page 7), a poem that makes a statement—crudely summed up, “I yearn to leave the city and retreat to a place of ideal peace and happiness.” And yet before we can realize this theme, we have to notice details: nine bean rows, a glade loud with bees, “lake water-lapping with low sounds by the shore,” the gray of a pavement. These details and not some abstract remark make clear what the poem is saying: that the city is drab, while the island hideaway is sublime.

Poets often strive for words that point to physical details and solid objects. They may do so even when speaking of an abstract idea:

- Beauty is but a flower
- Which wrinkles will devour;
- Brightness falls from the air,
- Queens have died young and fair.
- Dust lurch closed Helen's eye.
- I am sick, I must die.
- Lord, have mercy on us!

In these lines by Thomas Nashe, the abstraction beauty has grown petals that shrivel. Brightness may be a general name for light, but Nashe succeeds in giving it the weight of a falling body.

DICTIOn

If a poem says daubed instead of plant life, diaper years instead of infancy, we call its diction, or choice of words, concrete rather than abstract. Concrete words refer to what we can immediately perceive with our senses: dog, actor, chemical, or particular individuals who belong to those general classes: Drog, the fox terrier, Clint Eastwood, hydrogen sulfate. Abstract words express ideas or concepts: love, time, truth. In abstracting, we leave out some characteristics found in each individual, and instead observe a quality common to many. The word beauty, for instance, denotes what may be observed in numerous persons, places, and things.

Ezra Pound gave a famous piece of advice to his fellow poets: “Go in fear of abstractions.” This is not to say that a poet cannot employ abstract words, nor that all poems have to be about physical things. Much of T. S. Eliot’s Four Quartets is concerned with time, eternity, history, language, reality, and other things that cannot be physically handled. But Eliot, however high he may soar for a larger view, keeps returning to earth. He makes us aware of things.

Marianne Moore (1887-1972)

Silence

My father used to say,
“Superior people never make long visits, have to be shown Longfellow’s grave or the glass flowers at Harvard.
Self-reliant like the cat—
that takes its prey to privacy, the mouse’s limp tail hanging like a shoelace from its mouth—they sometimes enjoy solitude, and can be robbed of speech
by speech which has delighted them.
The deepest feeling always shows itself in silence;
not in silence, but restraint.”
Nor was he insincere in saying, “Make my house your inn.”
Inns are not residences.

Questions
1. Almost all of “Silence” consists of quotation. What are some possible reasons why the speaker prefers using another person’s words?
2. What are the words the father uses to describe people he admires?
3. The poem makes an important distinction between two similar words (lines 13-14). Explain the distinction Moore implies.
4. Why is “Silence” an appropriate title for this poem?

Robert Graves (1895-1985)

Down, Wanton, Down!

Down, wanton, down! Have you no shame
That at the whisper of Love’s name,
Or Beauty’s, presto! up you raise
Your angry head and stand at ease?
Word Choice, Word Order

The poet's love of language must, if language is to reward him with looked-for miracles, that is, with poetry, amount to a passion. The passion for things of the world and the passion for naming them must be in him indistinguishable.

Denise Levertov, "Origins of a Poem"

Words known in a poem is its language, that is, the words it uses. Yet those seem different in a poem. Even the most familiar will seem strange. In a poem, each word, being equally important, exists in absolute focus, having rarely achieves in fiction. . . . Words in a novel are subordinate to slices of action or characterization that push the plot forward. In a novel, they are the action.

Mark Strand, Introduction to Best American Poems of 1991 mountain and prairie and sky. When I write poetry, I use such words and also use abstract words. But it is difficult to give you a list of favorite words because words become vital—they come alive—within a certain context. A given word is extremely important and vital in one context and very interesting in another. It depends upon what's around the word.

N. Scott Momaday, in Ancestral Voices in its natural habitat and in its dimension of wilderness, the lizard can be seen as a beautiful thing. Its movements are very wonderful to watch.

Similarly, you can take almost any word and make it interesting by the way which you use it.
Words, Words, Words

We don't speak of tribal wars anymore.
I say simple faction fights there are no tribes around here only nations
it makes sense you see
'cause from there
one moves to multinational
It makes sense you get me
'cause from there
one gets one's homeland which is a reasonable idea
'cause from there
one can dabble with independence which deserves warm applause
— the bloodless revolution
we are talking of words words tossed around as if denied location by the wind we mean those words some spit others grab dress them up for the occasion them on the lap of an audience we are talking of those words that stalk our lives like policemen words no dictionary can embrace words that change sooner than seasons we mean words that spell out our lives
words, words, words
for there's a kind of poetic licence doing the rounds in these parts

Words identify and name, characterize and distinguish, compare and contrast. Words describe, limit, and embellish; words locate and measure.

Publication date is not available. This title is possibly an allusion to Hamlet 2.2:292.

Word Choice

Even though words may be elusive and changeable, "tossed around as if denied location by the wind," they still can "stalk our lives like policemen." In poetry, as in love and in politics, words matter.

Beyond the quantitative—how many words, how many letters and syllables—one must consider the quality of words. Which words are chosen, and why? Why are certain words placed next to others? What does a word suggest in a particular context? How are the words there? What exactly constitutes the right word?

- A Concrete word refers to words that change sooner than seasons, for example, a kiss or a flag.
- An Abstract word refers to an intangible idea, condition, or quality, something that cannot be perceived by the senses—love, patriotism, and so on. Abstract words refer to particular items.
- General words refer to entire classes or groups of items. As the following example illustrates, whether a word is specific or general is relative; its degree of specificity or generality depends on its relationship to other words:

1. Sonnet
2. Seventeenth-century sonnet
3. Elizabethan sonnet
4. Sonnet by Shakespeare
5. "My Mistress' Eyes Are Nothing Like the Sun"

Sometimes a poet wants a precise word, one that is both specific and concrete. At other times, however, a poet might prefer general or abstract... language, which may allow for more subtlety—or even for intentional ambiguity.

Finally, a word may be chosen for its connotation—what it suggests. Every word has one or more denotations—what it signifies without emotional associations, judgments, or opinions. The word family, for example, denotes "a group of related things or people." Connotation is a more complex matter, however, because a single word may have many different associations. In general terms, a word may have a connotation that is positive, neutral, or negative. Thus, family may have a positive connotation which describes a group of loving relatives; a neutral connotation when it describes an organized crime family. Beyond this distinction, family and any other word, may have a variety of emotional and social associations suggesting loyalty, warmth, home, security, or duty. In fact, many words have somewhat different meanings in different contexts. When you choose words, then, you must consider what a particular word may suggest to readers as well as what it denotes.

In the poem that follows, the poet chooses words for their connotations, their relationships to other words, and their connotations.

WALT WHITMAN

(1819–1892)

When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer

(1865)

When I heard the learn'd astronomer,
When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,
When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,

3 When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,
How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick,
Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,

10 Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars.

This poem might be paraphrased as follows: "When I grew restless listening to an astronomy lecture, I went outside, where I found I learned more just by looking at the stars than I had learned inside." But the power...
For the Grave of Daniel Boone

The farther he went the farther home grew, Kentucky became another room; the mansion arched over the Mississippi; flowers were spread all over the floor.

He traced ahead a deepening home, and better, with goldenrod:

Leaving the snakeskin of place after place, going on—after the trees the grass, a bird flying after a song.

Rifle so level, sighting so well his picture freezes down to now a story-picture for children.

They go over the velvet falls into the tapestry of his time.

Heirs to the landscape, feeling no jar:
It is like evening; they are the quail surrounding his fire, coming in for the kill;
their little feet move like grass,

Children, we live in a barbwire time but like to follow the old hands back—the ring in the light, the knuckle, the palm, all the way to Daniel Boone, hunting our own kind of deepening home.

From the land that was his I left this rock.

Here on his grave I put it down.

A number of words in "For the Grave of Daniel Boone" are noteworthy for their multiple denotations and connotations. In the first stanza for example, "home" does not mean Boone's residence; it connotes an abstract state, a dynamic concept that grows and deepens, encompassing state and rivers while becoming paradoxically more and more elusive. In other terms, Boone's "home" at the poem's end is a narrow, confined space, a grave. In a wider sense, his home is the United States, particularly the cultural landscape he explored. Thus, the word "home" comes to have a variety of associations to readers beyond its denotative meaning, suggesting both the infinite possibilities beyond the frontier and the realities of civilization's walls and fences.
WHY SPEAK FIGURATIVELY?

"I will speak daggers to her, but use none," says Hamlet, preparing to confront his mother. His statement makes sense only because we realize that daggers is to be taken two ways: literally (denoting sharp, pointed weapons) and nonliterally (referring to something that can be used like weapons—namely, words). Reading poetry, we often meet comparisons between two things whose similarity we have never noticed before. When Marianne Moore observes that a fir tree has "an emerald turkey-foot at the top," the result is a pleasure that poetry richly affords: the sudden recognition of likenesses.

A treecrop like a turkey-foot, words like daggers—such comparisons are called figures of speech. In its broadest definition, a figure of speech may be said to occur whenever a speaker or writer, for the sake of freshness or emphasis, departs from the usual denotations of words. Certainly, when Hamlet says he will speak daggers, no one expects him to release pointed weapons from his lips, for daggers is not to be read solely for its denotation. Its connotations—sharp, stabbing, piercing, wounding—also come to mind, and we see ways in which words and daggers work alike. (Words too can hurt by striking through pretenses, possibly, or by wounding their hearer's self-esteem.) In the statement "A razor is sharper than an ax," there is no departure from the usual denotations of razor and ax, and no figure of speech results. Both objects are of the same class: the comparison is not offensive to logic. But in King Lear's "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is! To have a thankless child," the objects—snake's tooth (fang) and ungrateful offspring—are so unlike that no reasonable comparison may be made between them. To find similarity, we attend to the connotations of serpent's tooth—biting, piercing, venom, pain—rather than to its denotations. If we are aware of the connotations of red rose (beauty, softness, freshness, and so forth), then the line "My love is like a red, red rose" need not call to mind a woman with a scarlet face and a thorny neck.

Figures of speech are not devices to state what is demonstrably untrue. Indeed they often state truths that more literal language cannot communicate; they call attention to the world of the mind—especially to the world of the imagination—by comparing it with the world-or-at-least-the-world's horizons and suggesting that we see the world from the eagle's height; the wrinkled sea becomes an aged, sluggish animal; mountain walls, possibly literal, also suggest a fort or castle; and finally the eagle itself is likened to a thunderbolt in speed and in power, perhaps also in that its beak is—like our abstract conception of a lightning bolt—pointed. How much of the poem can be taken literally? Only he clasps the crag, he stands, he watches, he falls. The rest is made of figures of speech. The result is that, reading Tennyson's poem, we gain a bird's-eye view of the physical world.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-1892)

The Eagle

He clasps the crag with crooked hands;
Close to the sun in lonely lands,
Ringed with the sun's own world, he stands.
The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls;
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunderbolt he falls.

This brief poem is rich in figurative language. In the first line, the phrase crooked hands may surprise us. An eagle does not have hands, we might protest; but the objection would be a quibble, for evidently Tennyson is indicating exactly how an eagle clasps a crag, in the way that human fingers grasp a thing. By implication, too, the eagle is a person. Close to the sun, if taken literally, is an absurd exaggeration, the sun being a mean distance of 93,000,000 miles from the earth. For the eagle to be closer to it by the altitude of a mountain is an approach so small as to be insignificant. But figuratively, Tennyson conveys that the eagle stands above the clouds, perhaps silhouetted against the sun, and for the moment belongs to the heavens rather than to the land and sea. The word ringed makes a circle of the whole world's horizon and suggests that we see the world from the eagle's height; the wrinkled sea becomes an aged, sluggish animal; mountain walls, possibly literal, also suggest a fort or castle; and finally the eagle itself is likened to a thunderbolt in speed and in power, perhaps also in that its beak is—like our abstract conception of a lightning bolt—pointed. How much of the poem can be taken literally? Only he clasps the crag, he stands, he watches, he falls. The rest is made of figures of speech. The result is that, reading Tennyson's poem, we gain a bird's-eye view of the physical world.

William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate.
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date.
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;...
Howard Moss (1922-1987)

Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day? 1976

Who says you're like one of the dog days?
You're nicer. And better.
Even in May, the weather can be gray,
And a summer sub-let doesn't last forever.
Sometimes the sun's too hot;
Sometimes it is not.
Who can stay young forever?
People break their necks or just drop dead!
But you? Never!
If there's just one condensed reader left
Who can figure out the abridged alphabet,
After you're dead and gone,
In this poem you'll live on!

Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day? (Moss). Dog days: the hottest days of summer. The ancient Romans believed that the Dog-star, Sirius, added heat to summer months.

Questions
1. In Howard Moss's streamlined version of Shakespeare, from a series called "Modified Sonnets (Dedicated to adapters, abridgers, digesters, and condensers everywhere)," to what extent does the poet use figurative language? In Shakespeare's original sonnet, how high a proportion of Shakespeare's language is figurative?
2. Compare some of Moss's lines to the corresponding lines in Shakespeare's sonnet. Why is the weather in May, the weather can be gray less interesting than the original? In the lines on the sun (5-6 in both versions), what has Moss's modification deliberately left out? Why is Shakespeare's seeing death as a brag magnet memorable? Why aren't you greatly impressed by Moss's last two lines?
3. Can you explain Shakespeare's play on the word untrimmed (line 8)? Evidently the word can mean "divested of trimmings," but what other suggestions do you find in it?
4. How would you answer someone who argued, "Maybe Moss's language isn't as good as Shakespeare's, but the meaning is still there. What's wrong with putting Shakespeare into up-to-date words that can be understood by everybody?"

METAPHOR AND SIMILE

Life, like a dome of many-colored glass,
Stains the white radiance of Eternity.
The first of these lines (from Shelley's "Adonais") is a simile: a comparison of two things, indicated by some connective, usually like, as, than, or a verb such as resembles. A simile expresses a similarity. Still, for a simile to exist, the things compared have to be dissimilar in kind. It is no simile to say "Your fingers are like mine": it is a literal observation. But to say "Your fingers are like sausages" is to use a simile. Omit the connective—say "Your fingers are sausages"—and the result is a metaphor, a statement that one thing is something else, which, in a literal sense, is not. In the second of Shelley's lines, it is assumed that Eternity is light or radiance, and we have an implied

Oh, my love is like a red, red rose.
Oh, my love resembles a red, red rose.
Oh, my love is redder than a rose.
Oh, my love is a red, red rose.
Oh, my love has red petals and sharp thorns.
Oh, I placed my love into a long-stemmed vase and I bandaged my bleeding thumb.

Often you can tell a metaphor from a simile by much more than just the presence or absence of a connective. In general, a simile refers to only one characteristic that two things have in common, while a metaphor is not plainly limited in the number of resemblances it may indicate. To use the simile "He eats like a pig" is to compare man and animal in one respect: eating habits. But to say "He's a pig" is to use a metaphor that might imply comparisons of appearance and morality as well.

For scientists as well as poets, the making of metaphors is customary. In 1933 George Lemaitre, the Belgian priest and physicist credited with the big bang theory of the origin of the universe, conceived of a primordial atom that existed before anything else, which expanded and produced everything. And so, he remarked, making a wonderful metaphor, the evolution of the cosmos as it is today "can be compared to a display of fireworks that has just ended." As astrophysicist and novelist Alan Lightman has noted, we can't help envisioning scientific discoveries in terms of things we know from daily life—spinning balls, waves in water, pendulums, weights on springs. "We have no other choice," Lightman reasons. "We cannot avoid forming mental pictures when we try to grasp the meaning of our equations, and how can we picture what we have not seen?" In science as well as in poetry, it would seem, metaphors are necessary instruments of understanding.

Mixed Metaphors

In everyday speech, simile and metaphor occur frequently. We use metaphors ("She's a doll!") and similes ("The tickets are selling like hotcakes") without being fully conscious of them. If, however, we are aware that words possess literal meanings as well as figurative ones, we do not write died in the wood for died in the woods or bow the line for bow the ear, nor do we use mixed metaphors as did the writer who advised, "Water the spark of knowledge and it will bear fruit." or the speaker who urged, "To get ahead, keep your nose to the grindstone, your shoulders to the wheel, your ears to the ground, and your eye on the ball." Perhaps the unintended humor of these statements comes from our seeing that the writer, busy stringing together stale metaphors, was not aware that they had any physical reference.

Unlike a writer who thoughtlessly mixes metaphors, a good poet can join together incongruous things and still keep the reader's respect. In his ballad "Thirty Bob a Week," John Davidson has a British workingman tell how it feels to try to support a large family on small wages:

It's a naked child against a hungry wolf;
It's playing bowls upon a splitting wreck;
It's walking on a string across a gulph.
With millionsore fore-and-aft about your neck,
But the thing is daily done by many and many a one;
And we fall, face forward, fighting, on the deck.

Like the man with his nose to the grindstone, Davidson's wage earner is in an abundant fix; but his balancing act seems far from merely nonsensical. For every one of the poet's comparisons—of workingman to child, to bowler, to tightrope walker, and to seaman—offers suggestions of a similar kind. All help us see (and imagine) the workingman's hard life: a brave and unyielding struggle against impossible odd.

Poetry and Metaphor
A poem may make a series of comparisons, like Davidson's, or the whole poem may be one extended comparison:

Emily Dickinson (1830-1886)
My Life had stood — a Loaded Gun
My Life had stood — a Loaded Gun —
In Corners — till a Day
The Owner passed — identified —
And carried Me away —
And now We roam in Sovereign Woods —
And now We hunt the Doe —
And every time I speak for Him —
The Mountains straight reply —
And do I smile, such cordial light
Upon the Valley glow —
It is as a Vesuvian face
Had let its pleasure through —
And when at Night — Our good Day done —
I guard My Master's Head —
'Tis better than the Eider-Duck's Deep Pillow — to have shared —
To foe of His — I'm deadly foe —
None stir the second time —
On whom I lay a Yellow Eye —
Or an emphatic Thumb —
Though I than He — may longer live
He longer must — than I —
For I have but the power to kill,
Without — the power to die —

How much life metaphors bring to poetry may be seen by comparing two poems by Tennyson and Blake.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-1892)
Flower in the Crannied Wall
Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies,
I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.

How many metaphors does this poem contain? None. Compare it with a briefer poem on a similar theme: the quatrain that begins Blake's "Auguries of Innocence."
(We follow here the opinion of W. B. Yeats, who, in editing Blake's poems, thought the lines ought to be printed separately.)

William Blake (1757-1827)
To see a world in a grain of sand
To see a world in a grain of sand
And a heaven in a wild flower,
Hold infinity in the palm of your hand
And eternity in an hour.

Set beside Blake's poem, Tennyson's—short though it is—seems lengthy. What contributes to the richness of "To see a world in a grain of sand" is Blake's use of a metaphor in every line. And every metaphor is loaded with suggestion. Our world does indeed resemble a grain of sand: in being round, in being stony, in being one of a myriad (the suggestions go on and on). Like Blake's grain of sand, a metaphor holds much, within a small circumference.

Sylvia Plath (1932-1963)
Metaphors
I'm a riddle in nine syllables,
An elephant, a ponderous house,
A melon strolling on two tendrils.
O red fruit, ivory, fine timbers!
This loaf's big with its yeasty rising.
Money's new-minted in this fat purse.
I'm a means, a stage, a cow in calf.
I've eaten a bag of green apples,
Boarded the train there's no getting off.

Questions
1. To what central fact do all the metaphors in this poem refer?
2. In the first line, what has the speaker in common with a riddle? Why does she say she has
   —
N. Scott Momaday (b. 1934)

Simile

What did we say to each other that now we are as the deer who walk in single file with heads high with ears forward with eyes watchful with hooves always placed on firm ground in whose limbs there is latent flight

Questions
1. Momaday never tells us what was said. Does this omission keep us from understanding the comparison?
2. The comparison is extended with each detail adding some new twist. Explain the implications of the last line.

Experiment: Likening

Write a poem that follows the method of N. Scott Momaday's "Simile," consisting of one long comparison between two objects. Possible subjects might include talking to a loved one long-distance; what you feel like going to a weekend job; being on a diet; not being noticed by someone you love; winning a lottery.

---

Emily Dickinson (1830-1886)

It dropped so low — in my Regard

It dropped so low — in my Regard —
I heard it hit the Ground —
And go to pieces on the Stones
At bottom of my Mind —
Yet blamed the Fate that flung it — less
Than I denounced Myself,
For entertaining Plated Wares
Upon My Silver Shelf —

Questions
1. What is it? What two things are compared?
2. How much of the poem develops and amplifies this comparison?

---

Craig Raine (b. 1944)

A Martian Sends a Postcard Home

Caxtons are mechanical birds with many wings and some are treasured for their markings—they cause the eyes to melt or the body to shriek without pain.

I have never seen one fly, but sometimes they perch on the hand.

Mist is when the sky is tired of flight and rests its soft machine on ground:
then the world is dim and bookish like engravings under tissue paper.

Rain is when the earth is television.
It has the property of making colors darker.

Model T is a room with the lock inside—a key is turned to free the world for movement, so quick there is a film to watch for anything missed.

But time is tied to the wrist or kept in a box, ticking with impatience.

In homes, a haunted apparatus sleeps,
that snores when you pick it up.

If the ghost cries, they carry it to their lips and soothe it to sleep with sounds. And yet, they wake it up deliberately, by tickling with a finger.

Only the young are allowed to suffer openly. Adults go to a punishment room with water but nothing to eat.
They lock the door and suffer the noises alone. No one is exempt and everyone's pain has a different smell.

At night, when all the colors die, they hide in pairs.

---

Jill Alexander Essbaum (b. 1971)

The Heart

Four simple chambers.
A thousand complicated doors.

One of them is yours.

---
and read about themselves—in color, with their eyelids shut.

A Martian Sends a Postcard Home. The title of this poem literally describes its contents. A Martian briefly describes everyday objects and activities on earth, but the visitor sees them all from an alien perspective. The Martian/author lacks a complete vocabulary and sometimes describes general categories of things with a proper noun (as in Model 1 in line 13). 1 Caxton: Books, since William Caxton (c. 1422–1491) was the first person to print books in England.

Question
Can you recognize everything the Martian describes and translate it back into Earth-based English?

Exercise: What Is Similar?
Each of these quotations contains a simile or a metaphor. In each of these figures of speech, what two things is the poet comparing? Try to state exactly what you understand the two things to have in common: the most striking similarity or similarities that the poet sees.

1. All the world's a stage,
   And all the men and women merely players:
   They have their exits and their entrances,
   And one man in his time plays many parts,
   His acts being seven ages.
   —William Shakespeare, As You Like It

2. When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces . . .
   —Algernon Charles Swinburne, "Atalanta in Calydon"

3. Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
   And our hearts, though strong and brave,
   Still, like muffled drums are beating
   Funeral marches to the grave.
   —Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, "A Psalm of Life"

4. "Hope" is the thing with feathers —
   That perches in the soul —
   And sings the tune without the words —
   And never stops - at all —
   —Emily Dickinson, an untitled poem

5. Why should I let the toad work
   Squat on my life?
   Can't I use my wit as a pitchfork
   And drive the brute off?
   —Philip Larkin, "Toads"

6. I wear my patience like a light-green dress and wear it thin.
   —Emily Grosholz, "Remembering the Ardèche"

7. a laugh maybe, like glasses on a shelf suddenly found by the sun . . .
   —Philip Larkin, "A Wide, Wide Sky"

8. A new electric fence,
   Its five barbed wires tight
   As a steel-stringed banjo.
   —Van K. Brock, "Driving at Dawn"

9. Spring stirs Gossamer Bemont Schoolmistress like a spoon.
   —Dylan Thomas, Under Milk Wood

10. Our headlight caught, as in a flashbulb's flare,
    A pair of hitchhikers.
    —Paul Lake, "Two Hitchhikers"

OTHER FIGURES OF SPEECH
When Shakespeare asks, in a sonnet,

O! how shall summer's honey breath hold out Against the wrackful siege of bating days, it might seem at first that he mixes metaphors. How can a breath confront the battering ram of an invading army? But it is summer's breath and, by giving it to summer, Shakespeare makes the season a man or woman. It is as if the fragrance of summer were the breath within a person's body, and winter were the onslaught of old age.

Personification
Such is Shakespeare's instance of personification: a figure of speech in which a thing, an animal, or an abstract term (truth, nature) is made human. A personification extends throughout this short poem.

James Stephens (1882–1950)

The Wind

The wind stood up and gave a shout.
He whistled on his fingers and
Kicked the withered leaves about
And thumped the branches with his hand
And said he'd kill and kill and kill,
And so he will and so he will.

The wind is a wild man, and evidently it is not just any autumn breeze but a hurricane or at least a stiff gale. In poems that do not work as well as this one, personification may be employed mechanically. Hollow-eyed personifications walk the works of lesser English poets of the eighteenth century: Coleridge has quoted the beginning of one such neoclassical ode, "Inoculation! heavenly Maid, descend!" It is hard for the contemporary reader to be excited by William Collins's "The Passions, An Ode for Music" (1747), which personifies, stanza by stanza, Fear, Anger, Despair, Hope, Reverses, Pain, Delight, Love, Hope, Melancholy, and Cheerfulness, and has them listen to Music, until even "Brown Exercise rejoiced to hear, / And Sport leapt up, and seized his beechen spear," Still, in "Two Sonnets on Fame" John Keats makes an abstraction come alive in seeing Fame as "a wayward girl."

Apostrophe
Hand in hand with personification often goes apostrophe: a way of addressing someone or something invisible or not ordinarily spoken to. In an apostrophe, a poet (in these examples Wordsworth) may address an inanimate object ("Spade! with which Wilkinson hath tilled his lands"), some dead or absent person ("Milton! thou shouldst be living at this hour"), an abstract thing ("Return, Delights!") or a spirit ("Thou Soul that art the eternity of thought"). More often than not, the poet uses apostrophe to announce a lofty and serious tone. An "O" may even be put in front of it ("O moon!") since, according to W. D. Snodgrass, every poet has a right to do so at least once in a lifetime. But apostrophe doesn't have to be highfalutin. It is a means of giving life to the inanimate. It is a way of giving body to the intangible, a way of speaking to it person to person, as in the words of a moving American spiritual: "Death, ain't you got no shame?"

Overstatement and Understatement
Most of us, from time to time, emphasize a point with a statement containing exaggeration: "Faster than greased lightning." "I've told him a thousand times." We speak, then, not literal truth but use a figure of speech called overstatement (or hyperbole). Poets too, being fond of emphasis, often exaggerate for effect. Instances are Marvell's profession of a love that should grow "Vaster than empires, and more slow" and John Burgon's description of Petra: "A rose-red city, half as old as Time." Overstatement can be used also for humorous purposes, as in a fat woman's boast (from a blues song): "Every time I shake, some skinny gal loses her home." The opposite is understatement, implying more than is said. Mark Twain in Life on the Mississippi recalls how, as an apprentice steamboat-pilot asleep when supposed to be on watch, he was roused by the pilot and sent clambering to the pilot house: "Mr. Bixby was close behind, commenting." Another example is Robert Frost's line "One could do worse than be a swinger of birches"—the conclusion of a poem that has suggested that to swing on a birch tree is one of the most deeply satisfying activities in the world.

Metonymy and Synecdoche
In metonymy, the name of a thing is substituted for that of another closely associated with it. For instance, we say "The White House decided," and mean that the president did. When John Dyer writes in "Grongar Hill,"

A little rule, a little sway,
A sun beam in a winter's day,
Is all the proud and mighty have Between the cradle and the grave,

we recognize that cradle and grave signify birth and death: A kind of metonymy, synecdoche is the use of a part of a thing to stand for the whole of it or vice versa.

We say "She lent a hand," and mean that she lent her entire presence. Similarly, Milton in "Lycidas" refers to greedy clergymen as "blind mouths."

Paradox
Paradox occurs in a statement that at first strikes us as self-contradictory but that on reflection makes some sense. "The peasant," said G. K. Chesterton, "lives in a larger world than the globe-trotter." Here, two different meanings of larger are contrasted: "greater in spiritual values" versus "greater in miles." Some paradoxical statements, however, are much more than plays on words. In a moving sonnet, the blind John Milton tells how one night he dreamed he could see his dead wife. The poem ends in a paradox:

But oh, as to embrace me she inclined,
I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

Pun
Asked to tell the difference between men and women, Samuel Johnson replied, "I can't conceive, madam, can you?" The great dictionary-maker was using a figure of speech known to classical rhetoricians as paronomasia, better known to us as a pun or play on words. How does a pun operate? It reminds us of another word (or other words) of similar or identical sound but of very different denotation. Although puns at their worst can be mere piddling quibbles, at best they can sharply point to surprising but genuine resemblances. The name of a dentist's country estate, Tooth Acres, is accurate: aching teeth paid for the property. In his novel Moby-Dick, Herman Melville takes up questions about whales that had puzzled scientists: for instance, are the whale's spoutings water or gaseous vapor? And when Melville speaks pointedly of the great whale "sprinkling and mistifying the gardens of the deep," we catch his pun, and conclude that the creature both mistifies and mystifies at once.

In poetry, a pun may be facetious, as in Thomas Hood's ballad of "Faithless Nelly Gray":

Ben Battle was a soldier bold,
And used to war's alarms;
But a cannon-ball took off his legs,
So he laid down his arms!

Or it may be serious, as in these lines on war by E. E. Cummings:

the bigness of cannon is skillful,
(is skillful becoming is kill-ful when read aloud), or perhaps, as in Shakespeare's song in Cymbeline, "Fear no more the heat of th' sun," both facetious and serious at once:

Golden lads and girls all must,
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.

Poets often make puns on images, thereby combining the sensory force of imagery with the verbal pleasure of wordplay. Find and explain the punning images in these two poems.
Margaret Atwood (b. 1939)

You fit into me
you fit into me
like a hook into an eye
a fish hook
an open eye

George Herbert (1593-1633)

The Pulley

When God at first made man,
Having a glass of blessings standing by—
Let us (said he) pour on him all we can;
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.

So strength first made a way,
Then beauty flowed, then wisdom, honor, pleasure:
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that, alone of all His treasure,
Rest in the bottom lay.

For if I should (said he)
Bestow this jewel also on My creature,
He would adore My gifts instead of Me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature:

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlessness;
Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
May toss him to My breast.

Questions
1. What different senses of the word rest does Herbert bring into this poem?
2. How do God's words in line 16, Yet let him keep the rest, seem paradoxical?
3. What do you feel to be the tone of Herbert's poem? Does the punning make the poem seem comic?
4. Why is the poem called "The Pulley"? What is its implied metaphor?

To sum up: even though figures of speech are not to be taken only literally, they refer us to a tangible world. By personifying an eagle, Tennyson reminds us that the bird and humankind have certain characteristics in common. Through metonymy, a poet can focus our attention on a particular detail in a larger object; through hyperbole and understatement, make us see the physical actuality in back of words. Pun and paradox cause us to realize this actuality, too, and probably surprise us enormously at the same time. Through anthropoby, the poet animates the inanimate and asks it to listen—speaks directly to an immediate god or to the revivified dead. Put to such uses, figures of speech have power. They are more than just ways of playing with words.

Dana Gioia (b. 1950)

Money

Money is a kind of poetry.
—Wallace Stevens

Money, the long green, cash, stash, rhino, jack or just plain dough.

Chock it up, fork it over, shell it out. Watch it burn holes through pockets.

To be made of it! To have it to burn! Greenbacks, double eagles, megabucks and Ginnie Macs.

It greases the palm, feathers a nest, holds heads above water,
makes both ends meet.

Money breeds money,
Gathering interest, compounding daily.
Always in circulation.

Money. You don't know where it's been, but you put it where your mouth is.
And it talks.

Question
What figures of speech can you identify in this poem?

Carl Sandburg (1878-1967)

Fog

The fog comes on little cat feet.
It sits looking over harbor and city on silent haunches
and then moves on.

Questions
1. What figure of speech does this poem use?
2. Which specific feline qualities does the speaker impute to the fog?
Charles Simic (b. 1938)

My Shoes
1967

Shoes, secret face of my inner life:
Two gaping toothless mouths,
Two partly decomposed animal skins
Smelling of mice nests.

My brother and sister who died at birth
Continuing their existence in you,
Guiding my life
Toward their incomprehensible innocence.

What use are books to me
When in you it is possible to read
The Gospel of my life on earth
And still beyond, of things to come?

I want to proclaim the religion
I have devised for your perfect humility
And the strange church
I am building
With you as the altar.

Ascetic and maternal, you endure:
Kin to oxen, to Saints, to condemned men,
With your mute patience, forming
The only true likeness of myself.

Questions
Which statements in this poem are literal, and which are not? For those that are figurative, identify the specific figure of speech that each employs.

FOR REVIEW AND FURTHER STUDY

Robert Frost (1874–1963)

The Silken Tent
1942

She is as in a field a silken tent
At midday when a sunny summer breeze
Has dried the dew and all its ropes relent,
So that in guys it gently sways at ease,
And its supporting central cedar pole,
That is its pinnacle to heavenward
And signifies the sureness of the soul.
Seems to owe naught to any single cord,
But strictly held by none, is loosely bound
By countless silken ties of love and thought
To everything on earth the compass round.
And only by one's going slightly taut
In the capriciousness of summer air

Questions
1. Is Frost's comparison of a woman and tent a simile or a metaphor?
2. What are the ropes or cords?
3. Does the poet convey any sense of this woman's character? What sort of person do you believe her to be?
4. Paraphrase the poem, trying to state its implied meaning. (To be refreshed about paraphrase, turn back to page 6.) Be sure to include the implications of the last three lines.

The Suitor
1978

We lie back to back. Curtains lift and fall,
like the chest of someone sleeping.
Wind moves the leaves of the box elder;
they show their light undersides, turning all at once
like a school of fish.
Suddenly I understand that I am happy.

Questions
In each simile you find in "The Suitor," exactly what is the similarity?

Exercise: Figures of Speech
Identify the central figure of speech in the following four short poems.

Robert Frost (1874–1963)

The Secret Sits
1942

We dance round in a ring and suppose,
But the Secret sits in the middle and knows.

Questions
Which statements in this poem are literal, and which are not? For those that are figurative, identify the specific figure of speech that each employs.

A. R. Ammons (1926–2001)

Coward
1975

Bravery runs in my family.

Kay Ryan (b. 1945)

Turtle
1994

Who would be a turtle who could help it?
A barely mobile hard roll, a four-oared helmet, she can ill afford the chances she must take in rowing toward the grasses that she eats.
a packing-case places, and almost any slope deafets her modest hopes. Even being practical, she's often stuck up to the axle on her way to something edible. With everything optimal, she skirts the ditch which would convert her shell into a serving dish. She lives below luck-level, never imagining some lottery will change her load of pottery to wings.
Her only levity is patience,
the sport of truly chastened things.

Anne Stevenson  (b. 1933)
The Demolition
They have lived in each other so long
There is little to do there.
They have taken to patching the floor
While the roof tears.

The rot in her feeds on his woodwork.
He batters her cellar.
He camps in the ruin of her carpet.
She cries on his stairs.

Robinson Jeffers  (1887-1962)
Hands
Inside a cave in a narrow canyon near Tassajara
The vault of rock is painted with hands,
A multitude of hands in the twilight, a cloud of men's palms,
no more.
No other picture. There's no one to say Whether the brown shy quiet people who are dead intended Religion or magic, or made their tracings
In the idleness of art; but over the division of years these careful
Signs-manual are now like a sealed message Saying: "Look: we also were human; we had hands, not paws.
All hail
You people with the cleverer hands, our suppliants
In the beautiful country, enjoy her a season, her beauty, and come down
And be supplanted; for you also are human."

Question
Identify examples of personification and apostrophe in "Hands."

Robert Burns  (1759-1796)
Oh, my love is like a red, red rose
(about 1788)
Oh, my love is like a red, red rose
That's newly sprung in June;
My love is like the melody
That's sweetly played in tune.
So fair art thou, my bonny lass,
So deep in love am I;
And I will love thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gang' dry.
Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun;
And I will love thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.
And fare thee weel, my only love!
And fare thee weel awhile!
And I will come again, my love
Though it were ten thousand mile.

Robert Frost on Writing
The Importance of Poetic Metaphor
I do not think anybody ever knows the discreet use of metaphors, his own and other people's, the discreet handling of metaphor, unless he has been properly educated in poetry.

Poetry begins in trivial metaphors, pretty metaphors, "grace" metaphors, and goes on to the profoundest thinking that we have. Poetry provides the one permissible way of saying one thing and meaning another. People say, "Why don't you say what you mean?" We never do that, do we, being all of us too much poets. We like to talk in parables and in hints and in indirections—whether from diffidence or some other instinct.

I have wanted in late years to go further and further in making metaphor the whole of thinking. I find someone now and then to agree with me that all thinking, except mathematical thinking, is metaphorical, or all thinking except scientific thinking. The mathematical might be difficult for me to bring in, but the scientific is easy enough.
Figures of Speech

The metaphor is probably the most fertile power possessed by man.

José Ortega y Gasset

Simplicity is made of comparisons, simple or complex, open or concealed. The texture of poetry is obtained by mixing or interweaving or juxtaposing comparisons. The mixture is either a mechanical mixture or a chemical one, when the mechanical becomes chemical the explosion takes place. The difference between prose and poetry. In prose all comparisons are simple and uncompounded. In poetry all metaphors are mixed metaphors.

J. Isaacs, The Background of Modern Poetry

We shall never be able to distinguish absolutely and with a hard edge image from the metaphor, any more than anyone has so distinguished the from poetry. . . . We shall very often be able to tell, just as we can very well tell the difference between snow and rain; but there are some weather systems either-neither, and so here there is an area where our differences are mingled. If the poet says, simply, “The red bird,” we shall probably take that as an image. But as soon as we read the rest of the line—“The red bird crosses the golden floor”—there arise obscure thoughts of relationships laid in the direction of parable: the line alone is not, strictly, a metaphor, but resonances take it prospectively beyond a pure perception . . .

Metaphor stands somewhat as a mediating term squarely between a thing and a word of thought, which may be why it is so likely to compose itself about a word of fact and a word of thought, as in this example of a common Shakespearean line: “Even to the teeth and forehead of my fault.”

Howard Nemerov, “On Metaphor”

Metaphor is not to be considered, . . . as the alternative of the poet, which he elect to use or not, since he may state the matter directly and straightforwardly if he chooses. It is frequently the only means available if he write at all . . .

Cleavenger Brooks, “Metaphor and the Tradition”
William Shakespeare
(1564–1616)

Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?
(1609)

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate.
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date.

Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance, or nature's changing course, untrimmed.
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st;
Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.
So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

Although figurative language is used in all kinds of writing, poets in particular recognize the power of a figure of speech to take readers beyond the literal meaning of a word. For this reason, figures of speech—expressions that describe one thing in terms of something else—are more prominent in poetry than in other kinds of writing. For example, the preceding sonnet by Shakespeare compares a loved one to a summer's day; in order to make the point that, unlike the fleeting summer, the loved one will—within the poem—remain forever young. But this sonnet goes beyond the obvious equation (loved one = summer's day); the speaker's assertion that his loved one will live forever in his poem actually says more about his confidence in his own talent and reputation (and about the power of figurative language) than about the loved one's beauty.

Simile, Metaphor, and Personification

When William Wordsworth opens a poem with “I wandered lonely as a cloud” (p. 847), he conveys a good deal more than he would if he simply said

1 Beauty you possess.
The dream to which Hughes alludes in his 1951 poem is the dream of racial equality. It is also the American Dream—or, by extension, the important unrealized dream. His speaker offers six tentative answers to the question asked in the poem’s first line, and five of the six are presented as similes. As the poem unfolds, the speaker considers different alternatives to the dream, and under the weight of the burden those who hold the dream must carry, the speaker transforms an abstract item—a raisin in the sun, a sore, rotten meat, syrupy candy, a heavy load. The final line of the poem, italicized for emphasis, gains power from what it says than from what it leaves unsaid. Unlike the other lines, this one has an extended simile: “Or does it explode?” is not presented as a comparison. Nevertheless, because of the pattern of repetition explored in the poem, “Or does it explode?” is not presented as a comparison. Nevertheless, because of the pattern of repetition in the poem has established, readers supply the other, unspoken half of the comparison: “…like a bomb.”

Sometimes a single extended simile or extended metaphor is developed throughout a poem. The poem that follows, for example, develops an extended simile: comparing a poet to an acrobat.

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI

(1919–)

Constantly Risking Absurdity

(1958)

Constantly risking absurdity and death whenever he performs above the heads of his audience
the poet like an acrobat climbs on rime
to a high wire of his own making and balancing on eyebeams above a sea of faces paces his way

---

To the other side of day performing entrechats and other high theatrics and all without mistaking any thing for what it may not be

For he’s the super realist who must perform perceive

taut truth
before the taking of each stance or step his supposed advance toward that still higher perch

where Beauty stands and waits with gravity to start her death-defying leap and he

a little charleychaplin man who may or may not catch her fair eternal form spreadeagled in the empty air of existence

This extended comparison between a poet and an acrobat, Ferlinghetti characterizes the poet as a kind of all-purpose circus performer, at once swinging recklessly on a trapeze and balancing carefully on a tightrope.

What the poem suggests is that the poet, like an acrobat, works hard at his craft but manages to make it all look easy. Something of an exhibitor, the poet is innovative and creative, taking impossible chances yet building on traditional skills in his quest for truth and beauty. Moreover, like an acrobat, the poet is balanced “on eyebeams / above a sea of faces,” for he too depends on audience reaction to help him keep his performance focused. The poet may be “the super realist,” but he also has plenty of playful tricks up his sleeve: “entrechats / and sleight-of-foot tricks / and other high theatrics, / including puns (“above the heads / of his audience”), unexpected rhyme (“climbs on time”), alliteration (“taut truth”), coinages (“a little charleychaplin man”), and all the other linguistic acrobatics available to poets. (Even the arrangement of the poem’s lines on the page suggests the acrobatics it describes.) Like these tricks, the poem’s central simile is a whimsical one, perhaps suggesting that Ferlinghetti is poking fun at poets who take their craft too seriously. In any case, the simile helps him to illustrate the acrobatic possibilities of language in a fresh and original manner.

The following poem develops an extended metaphor, personifying coming houses as old women.
Rooming Houses Are Old Women

(1968)

Rooming houses are old women rocking dark windows into their whens waiting incomplete circles rocking rent office to stoop to community bathrooms to gas rings and under-bed boxes of once useful garbage criy issued with a twice monthly check and the young men next door with their loud midnight parties and fishy rings left in the bathtub no longer arouse them from midnight to mealtime no stops inbetween light breaking to pass through jumbled up windows and who was it who married the widow that Buzzie's son messed with?
To Welfare and Insult form the slow shuffle from dayswork to shopping bags heavy with leftovers Rooming houses are old women waiting searching through darkening windows
the end or beginning of agony old women seen through half-ajar doors hoping they are not waiting but being the entrance to somewhere unknown and desired
but not new.

So closely does Lorde equate rooming houses and women in the poem that at times it is difficult to tell which of the two is actually the poem's subject. Despite the poem's assertion, rooming houses are not old women; however, they are comparable to the old women who live there, because their walls enclose a lifetime of disappointments as well as the physical tritus of life. Like the old women, rooming houses are in decline rocking away their remaining years. Like the houses they inhabit, these women's boundaries are fixed—"rent office to stoop to / community bathroom / gas rings"—and their hopes and expectations are few. They are surrounded by the products of their lives, just as Lorde herself describes the products of her own life.

Oh, My Love Is like a Red, Red Rose

(1796)

Oh, my love is like a red, red rose
That's newly sprung in June;
My love is like the melody
That's sweetly played in tune.

So fair art thou, my bonny lass,
So deep in love am I;
And I will love thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gan' dry.

Till a' the seas gan' dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun;
And I will love thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee well, my only love! And fare thee well awhile!
And I will come again, my love Though it were ten thousand mile.

Reading and Reacting

1. Why does the speaker compare his love to a rose? What other simile is used in the poem? For what purpose is it used?
2. Why do you suppose Burns begins his poem with similes? Would moving them to the end change the poem's impact?
3. Where does the speaker seem to exaggerate the extent of his numbers? Why does he exaggerate? Do you think this exaggeration weakens or increases the effectiveness of the poem? Explain.

Related Works: "Araby" (p. 226), "My Mistress' Eyes Are Nothing but a Sun" (p. 538), "To His Coy Mistress" (p. 679)

---

John Updike

(1932–)

Ex-Basketball Player

(1958)

Pearl Avenue runs past the high-school lot,
Bends with the trolley tracks, and stops, cut off
Before it has a chance to go two blocks,
At Colonel McComisky Plaza. Berth's Garage
Is on the corner facing west, and there,
Most days, you'll find Flick Webb, who helps Berth out.

Flick stands tall among the idiot pumps—
Five on a side, the old bubble-head style,
Their rubber elbows hanging loose and low.

One's nostrils are two S's, and his eyes
An E and O. And one is squat, without A head at all—more of a football type.

Once Flick played for the high-school team, the Wizards.
He was good: in fact, the best. In '46

He bucketed three hundred ninety points,
A county record still. The ball loved Flick.
I saw him rack up thirty-eight or forty
In one home game. His hands were like wild birds.

He never learned a trade, he just sells gas,
Checks oil, and changes flats. Once in a while,
As a gag, he dribbles an inner tube,
But most of us remember anyway.

His hands are fine and nervous on the lug wrench.
It makes no difference to the lug wrench, though.

Off work, he hangs around Mae's luncheonette,
Grease-gray and kind of coiled, he plays pinball,
Smokes those thin cigars, nurses lemon phosphates.
Flick seldom says a word to Mae, just nods
Beyond her face toward bright applauding tiers

---

Randall Jarrell

(1914–1965)

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner

(1945)

From my mother's sleep I fell into the State
And hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
I woke to black flak and the nightmare fighters.
When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose.

---

Reading and Reacting

1. Who is the speaker? To what does he compare himself in the poem's first two lines? What words establish this comparison?

2. Contrast the speaker's actual identity with the one he creates for himself in lines 1–2. What elements of his actual situation do you think lead him to characterize himself as he does in these lines?

3. Journal Entry Both this poem and "Dulce et Decorum Est" (p. 658) use figurative language to describe the horrors of war. Which poem has a greater impact on you? How does the poem's figurative language contribute to this impact?

4. Critical Perspective In a 1974 article, Frances Ferguson criticizes "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner," arguing that the poem "thoroughly manifests the lack of a middle between the gunner's birth and his death... Because the poem presents a man who seems to have lived in order to die, we forget the fiction that he must have lived." However, in a 1978 explication, Patrick
J. Horner writes that the “manipulation of time reveals the stunning brevity of the gunner’s waking life and the State’s total disregard for that phenomenon. . . .” Because of the telescopi time, . . . [the poem] resonates with powerful feeling."

With which critic do you agree? That is, do you see the "middle" of a middle as a positive or negative quality of this poem?

Related Works: “An Irish Airman Foresees His Death” (p. 545), “Good night Saigon” (p. 552), “Dulce et Decorum Est” (p. 658)

---

MARGE PIERCY
(1934–
)

The Secretary Chant
(1973)

My hips are a desk.
From my ears hang chains of paper clips.
Rubber bands form my hair.
My breasts are wells of mimeograph ink.
My feet bear casters.
Buzz. Click.
My head is a badly organized file.
My head is a switchboard!

where crossed lines crackle.
Press my fingers and in my eyes appear credit and debit.
Zing. Tinkle.

My navel is a reject button.
From my mouth issue canceled reams.
Swollen, heavy, rectangular
I am about to be delivered of a baby

Xerox machine.
File me under W because I wonce was a woman.

Reading and Reacting

1. Examine each of the poem’s figures of speech. Do they all make reasonable comparisons, or are some far-fetched or hard to visualize? Explain the relationship between the secretary and each item with which she is compared.

Journal Entry Using as many metaphors and similes as you can, write a "chant" about a job you have held.

Critical Perspective In a review of a recent collection of Piercy’s poetry, feminist critic Sandra Gilbert notes instances of “a kind of bombast” (pompous language) and remarks, “As most poets realize, political verse is almost the hardest kind to write.”

In what sense can “The Secretary Chant” be seen as “political verse”? Do you think Piercy successfully achieves her political purpose, or does she undercut it with “bombast”?

---

JOHN DONNE
(1572–1631)

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning
(1611)

As vicious men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say
The breath goes now, and some say no:

So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;
’Twere profanation of our joys
To tell the laity our love.

Moving of th’ earth brings harms and fears;
Men reckon what it did and meant;
But trepidation of the spheres,
Though greater far, is innocent.

Dull sublunary lovers’ love
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit

Absence, because it doth remove Those things which elemented it.
wobbles on a dry, measured beat.” Yet, he argues, “the poem comes choked with emotional power” because “the speaker reads as a naturally reticent man, leaving his beloved in uncertainty and deep trouble.” Stampfer concludes, “Easy self-expression here would be self-indulgent, if not reprehensible. ... For all his careful dignity, we feel a heart is breaking here.”

Do you find such emotional power in this highly intellectual poem?

Hyperbole and Understatement

Two additional kinds of figurative language, hyperbole and understatement, give poets opportunities to suggest meaning beyond the literal level of language.

Hyperbole is intentional exaggeration—saying more than is actually meant. In the poem “Oh, My Love Is Like a Red, Red Rose” (p. 667), when the speaker says that he will love his lady until all the seas go dry, he is using hyperbole. Understatement is just the opposite—saying less than is meant. When the speaker in the poem “Fire and Ice” (p. 589), weighing two equally grim alternatives for the end of the world, says that “for destruction ice / Is also great / And would suffice,” he is using understatement. In both cases, poets rely on their readers to understand that their words are not to be taken literally.

By using hyperbole and understatement, poets attract readers’ attention. For example, poets can use hyperbole to convey exaggerated anger or graphic images of horror—and to ridicule and satirize as well as to inflame and shock. With understatement, poets can convey the same kind of powerful emotions subtly, without artifice or embellishment, thereby leading readers to look more closely than they would otherwise do.

The emotionally charged poem that follows uses hyperbole to attract attention, conveying anger and bitterness that seem almost beyond the power of words.

SYLVIA PLATH
(1932-1963)

Daddy
(1965)

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot

Reading and Reacting

1. Beginning with line 25, the poem develops an extended metaphor called a concept, which compares the speaker and his loved one to “twin compasses” (26), attached and yet separate. Why is the compass an especially apt metaphor? What qualities of the compass does the poem emphasize?

2. The poem uses other figures of speech to characterize both the lovers’ union and their separation. To what other events does the speaker compare his separation from his loved one? To what other elements does he compare their attachment? Do you think these comparisons are effective?

3. Journal Entry To what other object could Donne have compared his loved one and himself? Explain the logic of the extended metaphor you suggest.

4. Critical Perspective In John Donne and the Metaphysical Poets (1970), Judah Stampfer writes of this poem’s “thin, dry texture, its stanzas of pinched music,” noting that its form “has too clipped a brevity to qualify as a song” and that its “music...
For thirty years, poor and white,
Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.
Daddy, I have had to kill you.
You died before I had time—
Marble-heavy, a bag full of God,
Ghastly statue with one grey toe
Big as a Frisco seal.
And a head in the freakish Atlantic
Where it pours bean green over blue
In the waters off beautiful Nauset.
I used to pray to recover you.

Ach, du.\(^1\)
in the German tongue, in the Polish town\(^2\)
Scraped flat by the roller
Of wars, wars, wars.
But the name of the town is common.
My Polack friend
Says there are a dozen or two.
So I never could tell where you
Put your foot, your root,
I never could talk to you.
The tongue stuck in my jaw.
It stuck in a barb wire snare.
Ich, ich, ich, ich.\(^4\)
I could hardly speak.
I thought every German was you.
And the language obscene
An engine, an engine
Chuffing me off like a Jew.
A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.\(^4\)
I began to talk like a Jew.
I think I may well be a Jew.
The snows of the Tyrol, the clear beer of Vienna
Are not very pure or true.
With my gypsy ancestress and my weird luck
And my Taroc pack and my Taroc pack
I may be a bit of a Jew.

\(^1\) Ah, you. (German)
\(^2\) Grabów, where Plath's father was born.
\(^4\) I. (German)
\(^4\) Nazi concentration camps.
There's a stake in your fat black heart
And the villagers never liked you.
They are dancing and stamping on you.
They always knew it was you.
80 Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through.

In her anger and frustration, the speaker sees herself as a helpless victim—a foot entombed in a shoe, a Jew in a concentration camp—of her father, a foot entrapped in a shoe, a Jew in a concentration camp—of her father's absolute tyranny. Thus, her hatred of her father is characterized as a "black shoe," "a bag full of God," a "ghastly statue." Eventually, a Nazi, a torturer, the devil, a vampire. The poem "Daddy" is characterized as a personal poem, autobiographical, and the fact that Plath's own father was actually neither a Nazi nor a sadist (nor, obviously, the devil or a vampire) makes it clear that the figurative comparisons in the poem are wildly exaggerated. Even so, they may convey the poet's feelings toward her father—and, perhaps, toward the patriarchal society which she lived.

Plath uses hyperbole as the medium through which to communicate these emotions to readers. Who she knows cannot possibly feel the way she feels. Her purpose, therefore, is not just to shock but also to enlighten and persuade, and perhaps even to empower her readers. Throughout the poem, the inflated language is set in ironic opposition to the childlike, affectionate term "Daddy"—most strikingly in the last line's chosen end stop "Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through." The result of the exaggerated rhetoric is a poem that is vivid and shocking. And, although some might believe that Plath's almost wild exaggeration undermines the poem's impact, others would argue that the powerful figurative language is necessary to convey the extent of the speaker's rage.

Like "Daddy," the next poem presents a situation whose emotions are devastating. In this case, however, the poet does not use emotional language; instead, he uses understatement, presenting the situation without embellishment.

DAVID HUDDLE
(1942-)

Holes Commence Falling
(1979)

The lead & zinc company owned the mineral rights to the whole town anyway, and after drilling holes for 3 or 4 years, they finally found the right place and sunk a mine shaft.

We were proud of all that digging,
even though nobody from town got hired. They were going to dig right under New River and hook up with the mine at Austinville.

Then people's wells started drying up just like somebody'd shut off a faucet, and holes commenced falling, big chunks of people's yards would drop 5 or 6 feet, houses would shift and crack. Now and then the company'd pay out a little money in damages; they got a truck to haul water and sell it to the people whose wells had dried up, but most everybody agreed the situation wasn't serious.

Though "Holes Commence Falling" relates a tragic sequence of events, the tone of the poem is matter-of-fact and the language is understated. Certainly the speaker could have overdramatized the events, using inflated rhetoric to denounce big business and to predict disastrous events for the future. At the very least, he could have colored the events with realistic emotions—assigning fault to the lead and zinc company with justifiable anger. Instead, the speaker is so restrained, so nonchalant, so passive that readers will supply the missing emotions themselves—realizing, for example, that the speaker concludes "everybody agreed the situation wasn't serious"—he means just the opposite.

Throughout the poem, unpleasant events are presented without compassion or emotion. As it proceeds, the poem traces the high and low points in the town's fortunes, but for every hope ("We were proud of all that digging") there is a disappointment ("even though nobody from town got hired"). The lead and zinc company offers some compensation for the damage it does, but never enough. The present tense verb of the poem's title indicates that the problems the town faces—wells drying up, houses dropping, houses shifting and cracking—are regular occurrences.
To His Coy Mistress

ANDREW MARVELL
(1621-1678)

To His Coy Mistress
(1681)

Had we but world enough and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love’s day.

Thou by the Indian Ganges’ side
Should’st rubies find; I by the tide
Of Humber’ would complain. I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews.

My vegetable love should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow.
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze,

Two hundred to adore each breast,
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.

For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate.
But at my back I always hear Time’s winged chariot hurrying near,
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.

Thy beauty shall no more be found,
Nor in thy marble vault shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long preserved virginity,
And your quaint honor turn to dust,

And into ashes all my lust.
The grave’s a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.

Now therefore, while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul tempers
At every pore with instant fires,

Reading and Reacting

1. Review the claims the poem’s speaker makes about her husband in lines 3–8. Are such exaggerated declarations of love necessary? Would the rest of the poem be sufficient to convey the extent of her devotion to her husband?

2. Journal Entry Compare this poem’s declarations of love to those of John Donne’s speaker in “A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning” (p. 671). Which speaker do you believe is more convincing? Why?

Related Works: “A Rose for Emily” (p. 81), “Bright Star! Would I were stedfast as Thou Art” (p. 813)
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like amorous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour
40 Than languish in his slow-chapped power.
Let us roll all our strength and all
Our sweetness up into one ball
And beat our pleasures with rough strife
Thorough the iron gates of life.
45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

READING AND REACTING

1. In this poem, Marvell's speaker sets out to convince a reluctant woman to become his lover. In order to make his case more convincing, he uses hyperbole, exaggerating time periods, sizes, spaces, and the possible fate of the woman, should she refuse him. Identify as many examples of hyperbole as you can.

2. The tone of "To His Coy Mistress" is more whimsical than serious. Given this tone, what do you see as the purpose of Marvell's use of hyperbole?

3. Journal Entry Using contemporary prose, paraphrase the first four lines of the poem. Then, beginning with the word But, write a few additional sentences, continuing the argument Marvell's speaker makes.

4. Critical Perspective In his poem "The Definition of Love," Marvell laments love that is kept apart by fate. He writes:

   "For Fate with jealous eye does see
   Two perfect loves, nor lets them close;
   Their union would her ruin be,
   And her tyrannic pow'r depose."

   How does Marvell propose to compensate for Fate's determination to keep true love apart in "To His Coy Mistress"?

Related Works: "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" (p. 469)
"The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (p. 536), "To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time" (p. 597), The Brut (p. 1040)

---

C.LIArTEl7

"Out, Out—" (1916)

The buzz saw snarled and ratted in the yard
And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
And from there those that lifted eyes could count
Five mountain ranges one behind the other
Under the sunset far into Vermont.
And the saw snarled and ratted, snarled and ratted,
As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
And nothing happened: day was all but done.
Call it a day, I wish they might have said
To please the boy by giving him the half hour
That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
His sister stood beside them in her apron
To tell them "Supper." At the word, the saw
As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
Leaped out at the boy's hand, or seemed to leap—
He must have given the hand. However it was,
Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
The boy's first outcry was a rueful laugh,
As he swung toward them holding up the hand
Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
Since he was old enough to know, big boy
Doing a man's work, though a child at heart—
He saw all spoiled. "Don't let him cut my hand off—
The doctor, when he comes. Don't let him, sister!"
So, But the hand was gone already.
The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
No one believed. They listened at his heart.
Little—less—nothing!—and that ended it.
No more so build on there. And they, since they Were not the one dead, turned to their affairs.

READING AND REACTING

1. The poem's title is an allusion to a passage in Shakespeare's Macbeth (5.5.23-28) that attacks the brevity and meaninglessness of life in very emotional terms:
"Out, out brief candle!
"Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player,
"That struts and frets his hour upon the stage
And then is heard no more. It is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing."

What idea do you think Frost wants to convey through the line "Out, Out—"?

2. Explain why each of the following qualifies as understatement:
   - "Neither refused the meeting." (18)
   - "He saw all spoiled." (25)
   - "... that ended it." (32)
   - "No more to build on there." (33)

Can you identify any other examples of understatement in the poem?

3. Journal Entry: Do you think the poem's impact is strengthened or weakened by its understated tone? Why?

   For a moment, his narration is reduced to the impotent word "So," and in that minimal word all his restrained grief is held. . . . That "So" is the narrator's cry of bearing witness to that must be what it is in a scene he cannot enter. He cannot rescue or protect the boy. . . . In the poem's sense of human helplessness in an indifferent universe, we are all "watchers," and what we see is death without redemption, "signifying nothing." So. So? So! How shall we read this enigmatic word?

   How do you read this "enigmatic word" in the poem?

Related Works: "The Lottery" (p. 271), "What Were They Like?" (p. 549), "Hope" (p. 602), "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" (p. 669)

DONALD HALL
(1928-)

My Son, My Executioner
(1955)

My son, my executioner,
I take you in my arms,
Quiet and small and just astir,
And whom my body warms.

Sweet death, small son, our instrument
Of immortality,
Your cries and hungers document
Our bodily decay.
We twenty-five and twenty-two,
Who seemed to live forever,
Observe enduring life in you
And start to die together.

Reading and Reacting

Because the speaker is a young man holding his newborn son in his arms, the equation in line 1 comes as a shock. What is Hall's purpose in opening with such a startling statement?

In what sense is the comparison between baby and executioner a valid one? Could you argue that, given the underlying between the two, Hall is not using hyperbole? Explain.

Related Works: "Doe Season" (p. 305), "That Time of Year Thou Mayst in Me Behold" (p. 523), "Morning Song" (p. 596), "Sailing to (p. 851)

MARGARET ATWOOD
(1939-)

You Fit into Me
(1971)

you fit into me
like a hook into an eye
a fish hook
an open eye

Reading and Reacting

1. What connotations does Atwood expect readers to associate with the phrase "you fit into me"? What does the speaker seem at first to mean by "like a hook into an eye" in line 2?

2. The speaker's shift to the brutal suggestions of lines 3 and 4 is calculated to shock readers. Does the use of hyperbole here have another purpose in the context of the poem? Explain.

Related Works: "Popular Mechanics" (p. 353), "Daddy" (p. 673), A Doll House (p. 970)
Metonymy and Synecdoche

Metonymy and synecdoche are two related figures of speech. Metonymy is the substitution of the name of one thing for the name of another thing that most readers associate with the first—for example, using hire to mean “paid assassin” or suits to mean “business executives.” A kind of metonymy, called synecdoche, is the substitution of the whole (for example, using bread—as in “Give us this day our daily bread”—to mean “food”) or the whole for a part (for example, saying you can take the boy out of Brooklyn, but you can’t take Brooklyn [mean its distinctive traits] out of the boy”). With metonymy and synecdoche instead of describing something by saying it is like something else (as in simile) or by equating it with something else (as in metaphor), writers can characterize an object or concept by using a term that evokes it. The following poem illustrates the use of synecdoche.

To Lucasta Going to the Wars

(1649)

Tell me not, Sweet, I am unkind
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

True, a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field:
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such
As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, Dear, so much,
Loved I not Honor more.

Here, Lovelace’s use of synecdoche allows him to condense a number of complex ideas into a very few words. In line 3, when the speaker says he is flying from his loved one’s “chaste breast and quiet mind,” he is using “breast” and “mind” to stand for all his loved one’s physical, intellectual attributes. In line 8, when he says that he is embracing “sword, a horse, a shield,” he is using these three items to represent all the trappings of war—and, thus, to represent war itself.
What two elements are being compared in each of these simile, metaphor, and personification? Is the comparison logical? What characteristics are shared by the two items being compared?

How do figures of speech contribute to the impact of the poem as a whole?

Does the poet use hyperbole? Why? For example, is it used to move the reader or to shock the reader, or is it use intended to produce a humorous, satirical effect?

Does the poet use understatement? For what purpose? Would more straightforward language be more effective?

In metonymy and synecdoche what item is being substituted for another? What purpose does the substitution serve?

If the poem includes apostrophe, whom or what does the speaker address? What is accomplished through the use of apostrophe?

---

Writing Suggestions: Figures of Speech

1. Various figures of speech are often used to portray characters in a poem. Choose two or three poems that focus on a single character—for example, "Ex-Basketball Player" (p. 668), "Richard Cory" (p. 827), or "Gracie" (p. 634)—and explain how figures of speech are used to characterize each poem’s central figure. If you like, you may write about poems that focus on real (rather than fictional) people—for example, "Emmett Till" (p. 798) or "Medgar Evers" (p. 864).

2. Write an essay in which you discuss the different ways poets use figures of speech to examine the nature of poetry itself. What kinds of figures of speech do poets use to describe their craft? (You might begin by reading the three poems about poetry that open Chapter 11.)

3. Write a letter replying to the speaker in a poem by Marvell, Bradstreet, Donne, or Burns that appears in this chapter. Use figurative language to express the depth of your love and the extent of your devotion.

4. Choose two or three poems that have a common subject—for example, love, nature, war, art, or mortality—and write a paper in which you draw some general conclusions about the relative effectiveness of the poems’ use of figurative language to examine that subject.

5. Select a poem and a short story that treat the same subject matter and write a paper in which you compare their use of figures of speech.
Imagery

* * *

Images are probably the most important part of the poem. First of all, you can't tell a story, but images are what are going to shore it up and get to the heart of the matter... If they're not coming, I'm not even writing a poem. It's pointless.

Anne Sexton, Writers at Work, 4th Ed.

The difference between a literature that includes the image, and a literature that excludes the image (such as the newspaper or the scientific Newtonian mind), is that the first helps us to bridge the gap between ourselves and nature, the second encourages us to remain isolated, living despairingly in the world. Many philosophers and critics urge us to remain in the gap, and let the world of nature and the world of men fall further and further apart. We can do it for a human being can reach out with his right hand to the natural world, with his left hand to the world of human intelligence, and touch both at the same moment. Apparently no one but human beings can do this.

Robert Bly, "What the Image Can Do"

The poet sits before a blank piece of paper with a need to say many things in a small space of the poem. The world is huge, the poet is alone, and the poem is just a bit of language, a few scratchings of a pen surrounded by the silence of the night.

It could be that the poet wishes to tell you about his or her life. A few moments of some fleeting moment when one was happy or exceptionally lucky.

A secret wish of poetry is to stop time. The poet wants to retrieve a face, a cloud in the sky, a tree in the wind, and take a kind of mental photograph of that moment in which you as a reader recognize yourself. This is other people's snapshots in which we recognize ourselves.

Charles Simic, Introduction to Best American Poetry, 1992

It is better to present one image in a lifetime than to produce voluminous works.

Ezra Pound, "A Retrospect"

* * *
Cloud Painter (1984)

Suggested by the life and art of John Constable

At first, as you know, the sky is incidental—a drape, a backdrop for trees and steeple.
Here an oak clutching a rock (already he works outdoors), a wall buckles but does not break, water pearls through a lock, a haywain trembles.
The pleasures of landscape are endless. What we see around us should be enough.
Horizons are typically high and far away.

Still, clouds let us drift and remember. He is, after all, a miller’s son, used to trying to read the future in the sky, seeing instead ships, horses, instruments of flight.
Is that his mother’s wash flapping on the line? His schoolbook, smudged, illegible?

In this period the sky becomes significant.
Cloud forms are technically correct—mares’ tails, sheep-in-the-meadow, thunderheads.
You can almost tell which scenes have been interrupted by summer showers.

Now his young wife dies. His landscapes achieve belated success. He is invited to join the Academy. I forget whether he accepts or not.

In any case, the literal forms give way to something spectral, nameless. His palette shrinks to gray, blue, white—the colors of charity.
Horizons sink and fade, trees draw back till they are little more than frames, then they too disappear.

---

1 John Constable (1776-1837)—British painter noted for his landscapes.
2 An open horse-drawn wagon for carrying hay.
There's a stake in your fat black heart
And the villages never liked you.
They are dancing and stamping on you.
They always knew it was you.

25 Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through.

In her anger and frustration, the speaker sees herself as a helpless victim-a foot entrapped in a shoe, a flea in a concentration camp-of her father's (and, later, her husband's) absolute tyranny. Thus, her hated father is characterized as a "black shoe," "a bag full of God," a "ghastly statue," and, eventually, a Nazi, a torturer, the devil, a vampire. The poem "Daddy," by scholars as autobiographical, and the fact that Plath's own father was actually neither a Nazi nor a sadist (nor, obviously, the devil or a vampire) makes it clear that the figurative comparisons in the poem are wildly exaggerated. Even so, they may convey the poet's unconscious feelings toward her father—and, perhaps, toward the patriarchal society in which she lived.

Plath uses hyperbole as the medium through which to communicate these emotions to readers who she knows cannot possibly feel the way she does. Her purpose, therefore, is not just to shock but also to enlighten and persuade, and perhaps even to empower her readers. Throughout the poem, the inflammatory language is set in ironic opposition to the childish, affectionate term "Daddy"—most strikingly in the last line's shouted "Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through." The result of the exaggerated rhetoric is a poem that is vivid and shocking. And, although one might believe that Plath's almost wild exaggeration undermines the poem's impact, others would argue that the powerful figurative language is necessary to convey the extent of the speaker's rage.

Like "Daddy," the next poem presents a situation whose emotion is devastating. In this case, however, the poet does not use emotional language; instead, he uses understatement, presenting the event without embellishment.

DAVID HUDDLE

(1942-)

Holes Commence Falling

(1979)

The lead & zinc company owned the mineral rights to the whole town anyway, and after drilling holes for 3 or 4 years, they finally found the right place and sunk a mine shaft. We were proud of all that digging.

10 even though nobody from town got hired. They were going to dig right under New River and hook up with the mine at Austinville.

Then people's wells started drying up just like somebody'd shut off a faucet. And holes commenced falling, big chunks of people's yards would drop 5 or 6 feet. Houses would shift and crack. Now and then the company'd pay out a little money in damages; they got a truck to haul water and sell it to the people whose wells had dried up, but most everybody agreed the situation wasn't serious.

Though "Holes Commence Falling" relates a tragic sequence of events, the language of the poem is matter-of-fact and the language is understated. Certainly the speaker could have overdramatized the events, using inflated rhetoric to denounce big business and to predict disastrous events for the future. At the very least, he could have colored the events with realistic emotions, assigning blame to the lead and zinc company with justifiable anger. Instead, the speaker is so restrained, so nonchalant, so passive that readers supply the missing emotions themselves—realizing, for example, that when the speaker concludes "everybody agreed the / situation wasn't / serious, he means just the opposite.

Throughout the poem, unpleasant events are presented without comment or emotion. As it proceeds, the poem traces the high and low points in the town's fortunes, but for every hope ("We were proud / of all / there is a disappointment" ("even though nobody from town got hired")). The lead and zinc company offers some compensation to help repair the damage it does, but never enough. The present tense verb of the title indicates that the problems the town faces—wells drying up, houses dropping, houses shifting and cracking—are regular occurrences.
Eventually, readers come to see that what is not expressed, just below the surface—anger, powerlessness, resentment, hopelessness—is the poem’s real subject. The speaker’s laconic speech and flatness seem to suggest an attitude of resignation, but the obvious contrast between the understated tone and the seriousness of the problem create a sense of irony that makes the speaker’s real attitude toward the zinc company company clear.

Poems for Further Reading: Hyperbole and Understatement

Anne Bradstreet
(1612?-1672)
To My Dear and Loving Husband
(1678)

If ever two were one, then surely we.
If ever man were lov’d by wife, then thee;
If ever wife was happy in a man,
Compare with me ye women if you can.

Prize thy love more than whole Mils of gold,
Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
My love is such that Rivers cannot quench,
Nor ought but love from thee, give recompense.

Thy love is such I can no way repay,
The heavens reward thee manifold I pray.

Then while we live, in love let’s so persever,
That when we live no more, we may live ever.

Reading and Reacting

1. Review the claims the poem’s speaker makes about her husband in lines 5-8. Are such exaggerated declarations of love necessary, would the rest of the poem be sufficient to convey the extent of her devotion to her husband?

2. Journal Entry Compare this poem’s declarations of love to those of John Donne’s speaker in “A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning” (p. 671). Which speaker do you believe is more convincing? Why?

Related Works: “A Rose for Emily” (p. 81), “Bright Star! Would I were living” (p. 812), “Steadfast as Thou Art” (p. 813)
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like amorous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour
Than languish in his slow-chapped power.
Let us roll all our strength and all
Our sweetness up into one ball
And teer our pleasures with rough strife
Thorough the iron gates of life.

Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

Reading and Reacting

1. In this poem, Marvell’s speaker sets out to convince a reluctant woman to become his lover. In order to make his case more convincing, he uses hyperbole, exaggerating the periods, sizes, and spaces, and the possible fate of the woman, should she refuse. Identify as many examples of hyperbole as you can.

2. The tone of “To His Coy Mistress” is more whimsical than serious. Given this tone, what do you see as the purpose of Marvell’s hyperbole?

3. Journal Entry Using contemporary prose, paraphrase the four lines of the poem. Then, beginning with the word But, write a few additional sentences, continuing the argument Marvell’s speaker makes.

4. Critical Perspective In his poem “The Definition of Love,” Marvell laments love that is kept apart by fate. He writes:

   For Fate with jealous eye does see
   Two perfect loves, nor lets them close;
   Their union would her ruin be,
   And her tyrannic pow’r depose.

   How does Marvell propose to compensate for Fate’s determination to keep true love apart in “To His Coy Mistress”?

—Robert Frost

(1874-1963)

“Out, Out—”

(1915)

The buzz saw snarled and rattled in the yard.
And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
And from there those that lifted eyes could count
Five mountain ranges one behind the other
Under the sunset far into Vermont.
And the saw snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled,
As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
And nothing happened: day was all but done.
Call it a day, I wish they might have said.
To please the boy by giving him the half hour
That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
His sister stood beside them in her apron
To tell them “Supper.” At the word, the saw,
As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
Leaped out at the boy’s hand, or seemed to leap—
He must have given the hand. However it was,
Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
The boy’s first outcry was a rueful laugh,
As he swung toward them holding up the hand
Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
Since he was old enough to know, big boy
Doing a man’s work, though a child at heart—
He saw all spoiled. “Don’t let him cut my hand off—
The doctor, when he comes. Don’t let him, sister!”
So. But the hand was gone already.
The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
No one believed. They listened at his heart.
Little—less—nothing!—and that ended it.
No more to build on there. And they, since they Were not the one dead, turned to their affairs.

—Robert Frost

(1874-1963)

“Out, Out—”

(1915)

The buzz saw snarled and rattled in the yard.
And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
And from there those that lifted eyes could count
Five mountain ranges one behind the other
Under the sunset far into Vermont.
And the saw snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled,
As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
And nothing happened: day was all but done.
Call it a day, I wish they might have said.
To please the boy by giving him the half hour
That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
His sister stood beside them in her apron
To tell them “Supper.” At the word, the saw,
As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
Leaped out at the boy’s hand, or seemed to leap—
He must have given the hand. However it was,
Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
The boy’s first outcry was a rueful laugh,
As he swung toward them holding up the hand
Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
Since he was old enough to know, big boy
Doing a man’s work, though a child at heart—
He saw all spoiled. “Don’t let him cut my hand off—
The doctor, when he comes. Don’t let him, sister!”
So. But the hand was gone already.
The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
No one believed. They listened at his heart.
Little—less—nothing!—and that ended it.
No more to build on there. And they, since they Were not the one dead, turned to their affairs.

—Robert Frost

(1874-1963)

“Out, Out—”

(1915)

The buzz saw snarled and rattled in the yard.
And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
And from there those that lifted eyes could count
Five mountain ranges one behind the other
Under the sunset far into Vermont.
And the saw snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled,
As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
And nothing happened: day was all but done.
Call it a day, I wish they might have said.
To please the boy by giving him the half hour
That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
His sister stood beside them in her apron
To tell them “Supper.” At the word, the saw,
As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
Leaped out at the boy’s hand, or seemed to leap—
He must have given the hand. However it was,
Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
The boy’s first outcry was a rueful laugh,
As he swung toward them holding up the hand
Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
Since he was old enough to know, big boy
Doing a man’s work, though a child at heart—
He saw all spoiled. “Don’t let him cut my hand off—
The doctor, when he comes. Don’t let him, sister!”
So. But the hand was gone already.
The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
No one believed. They listened at his heart.
Little—less—nothing!—and that ended it.
No more to build on there. And they, since they Were not the one dead, turned to their affairs.
"Out, out brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage
And then is heard no more. It is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing."

What idea do you think Frost wants to convey through the title of the poem? "Out, Out—"?

1. Explain why each of the following qualifies as understatement:

- "Neither refused the meeting." (18)
- "He saw all spoiled." (25)
- "... that ended it." (32)
- "No more to build on there." (33)

Can you identify any other examples of understatement in the poem?

2. Explain why the poet's narrating voice in line 27 of "Out, Out—":

For a moment, his narration is reduced to the impotent words "So," and in that minimal word all his restrained grief is held... That "So" is the narrator's cry of bearing witness to the story that must be what it is in a scene he cannot enter. He cannot rescue or protect the boy... In the poem's sense of human helplessness in an indifferent universe, we are all "watchers," and what we see is death without redemption, "signifying nothing." So. So? So! How shall we read that enigmatic word?

How do you read this "enigmatic word" in the poem?

Works: "The Lottery" (p. 271), "What Were They Like?" (p. 349), "Hope" (p. 602), "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" (p. 669)

MARGARET ATWOOD
(1939-
)

You Fit into Me
(1971)

you fit into me
like a hook into an eye
a fish hook
an open eye

READING AND REACTING

1. What connotations does Atwood expect readers to associate with the phrase "you fit into me"? What does the speaker seem at first to mean by "like a hook into an eye" in line 2?

2. The speaker shifts to the brutal suggestions of lines 3 and 4 is calculated to shock readers. Does the use of hyperbole here have another purpose in the context of the poem? Explain.

Related Works: "Popular Mechanics" (p. 353), "Daddy" (p. 673), A House (p. 970)

DONALD HALL
(1928-
)

My Son, My Executioner
(1955)

My son, my executioner,
I take you in my arms,
Quiet and small and just astir,
And whom my body warms.

Sweet death, small son, our instrument
Of immortality.
Your cries and hungers document
Our bodily decay.
We twenty-five and twenty-two,
Who seemed to live forever.
Observe enduring life in you
And start to die together.

READING AND REACTING

Because the speaker is a young man holding his newborn son in his arms, the equation in line 1 comes as a shock. What is Hall's purpose in opening with such a startling statement? In what sense is the comparison between baby and executioner a valid one? Could you argue that, given the underlying similarities between the two, Hall is not using hyperbole? Explain.

Related Works: "Doe Season" (p. 305), "That Time of Year Thou Mayst in Me Behold" (p. 523), "Morning Song" (p. 596), "Sailing to Byzantium" (p. 851)
Metonymy and Synecdoche

Metonymy and synecdoche are two related figures of speech. Metonymy is the substitution of the name of one thing for the name of another with which it is associated in the mind of the speaker or listener. Synecdoche is the substitution of a part for the whole (for example, using bread—as in “Give us this day our bread”—to mean “food”) or the whole for a part (for example, saying “can take the boy out of Brooklyn, but you can’t take Brooklyn [nor its distinctive traits] out of the boy”). With metonymy and synecdoche, instead of describing something by saying it is like something else (simile) or by equating it with something else (as in metaphor), writers characterize an object or concept by using a term that evokes it.

RICHARD LOVELACE
(1618–1658)

To Lucasta Going to the Wars

(1649)

Tell me not, Sweet, I am unkind
That from the nunneries
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

3 True, a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such
As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, Dear, so much,
Loved I not Honor more.

Apostrophe

Apostrophe, a poem’s speaker addresses an absent person or thing, for example, a historical or literary figure or even an inanimate object or an abstract concept.

In the following poem, the speaker addresses Vincent Van Gogh.

SONIA SANCHEZ
(1934–)

(1984)

I saw you vincent van gogh perched on those pennsylvania cornfields communing amid secret black bird societies. yes.
I’m sure that was you exploding your fantastic delirium
while in the distance red indian hills beckoned.

Expecting her readers to be aware that Van Gogh is a Dutch postimpressionist painter known for his mental instability as well as for his art, Sanchez is able to give added meaning to a phrase such as “fantastic delirium” as well as to the poem’s visual images. The speaker sees Van Gogh perched like a black bird on a fence, and at the same time she also sees that he sees. Like Van Gogh, then, the speaker sees the Pennsylvania cornfields as both a natural landscape and an “exploding” work of art.

Here, Lovelace’s use of synecdoche allows him to condense a number of complex ideas into a very few words. In line 3, when the speaker says he is flying from his loved one’s “chaste breast and quiet mind,” he is using “breast” and “mind” to stand for all his loved one’s physical and intellectual attributes. In line 8, when he says that he is embracing a sword, a horse, a shield,” he is using these three items to represent the trappings of war—and, thus, to represent war itself.

CHECKLIST: WRITING ABOUT FIGURES OF SPEECH

The figures of speech present in the poem illustrate each of the following examples of simile, metaphor, personification, hyperbole, understatement, metonymy, synecdoche, and apostrophe.

The whole (for example, using bread—as in “Give us this day our bread”—to mean “food”) or the whole for a part (for example, saying “can take the boy out of Brooklyn, but you can’t take Brooklyn [nor its distinctive traits] out of the boy”).
Writing Suggestions: Figures of Speech

1. Various figures of speech are often used to portray characters in a poem. Choose two or three poems that focus on a single character—for example, "Ex-Basketball Player" (p. 668), "Richard Cory" (p. 827), or "Gracie" (p. 634)—and explain how figures of speech are used to characterize each poem’s central figure. If you like, you may write about poems that focus on real (rather than fictional) people—for example, "Emmett Till" (p. 798) or "Medgar Evers" (p. 864).

2. Write an essay in which you discuss the different ways poets use figures of speech to examine the nature of poetry itself. What kinds of figures of speech do poets use to describe their craft? (You might begin by reading the three poems about poetry that open Chapter 11.)

3. Write a letter replying to the speaker in a poem by Marvell, Bradstreet, Donne, or Burns that appears in this chapter. Use figurative language to express the depth of your love and the extent of your devotion.

4. Choose two or three poems that have a common subject—for example, love, nature, war, art, or mortality—and write a paper in which you draw some general conclusions about the relative effectiveness of the poems’ use of figurative language to examine that subject.

5. Select a poem and a short story that treat the same subject matter and write a paper in which you compare their use of figures of speech.
Chapter 15

Imagery

Images are probably the most important part of the poem. First of all, you have to tell a story, but images are what are going to shore it up and get to the heart of the matter. . . . If they’re not coming, I’m not even writing a poem; it’s pointless.

Anne Sexton, Writers at Work, 4th Ed.

The difference between a literature that includes the image, and a literature that excludes the image (such as the newspaper or the scientific Newtonian) is that the first helps us to bridge the gap between ourselves and nature, the second encourages us to remain isolated, living despairingly in the forest. Many philosophers and critics urge us to remain in the gap, and let the world of nature and the world of men fall further and further apart. We can do this if we are human beings. We can reach out with his right hand to the natural world, with his left hand to the world of human intelligence, and touch both at the same moment. Apparently no one but human beings can do this.

The poet sits before a blank piece of paper with a need to say many things in a small space of the poem. The world is huge, the poet is alone, and the world is just a bit of language, a few scratchings of a pen surrounded by the silence of the night.

Could it be that the poet wishes to tell you about his or her life. A few lines of some fleeting moment when one was happy or exceptionally lucid. The secret wish of poetry is to stop time. The poet wants to retrieve a face, a cloud in the sky, a tree in the wind, and take a kind of mental snapshot of that moment in which you as a reader recognize yourself. These are other people’s snapshots in which we recognize ourselves.

Charles Simic, Introduction to Best American Poetry, 1992

It is better to present one image in a lifetime than to produce voluminous works.

Ezra Pound, “A Retrospect”
Cloud Painter

(1984)

Suggested by the life and art of John Constable

At first, as you know, the sky is incidental—a drape, a backdrop for trees and steeples. Here an oak clutches a rock (already he works outdoors), a wall buckles but does not break, water pearls through a lock, a haywain trembles.

The pleasures of landscape are endless. What we see around us should be enough. Horizons are typically high and far away.

Still, clouds let us drift and remember. He is, after all, a miller's son, used to trying to read the future in the sky, seeing instead ships, horses, instruments of flight. Is that his mother's wash flapping on the line? His schoolbook, smudged, illegible?

In this period the sky becomes significant. Cloud forms are technically correct—mares' tails, sheep-in-the-meadow, thunderheads. You can almost tell which scenes have been interrupted by summer showers.

Now his young wife dies. His landscapes achieve belated success. He is invited to join the Academy. I forget whether he accepts or not.

In any case, the literal forms give way to something spectral, nameless. His palette shrinks to gray, blue, white—the colors of charity. Horizons sink and fade, trees draw back till they are little more than frames, then they too disappear.

---

1 John Constable (1776-1837)—British painter noted for his landscapes.
2 An open horse-drawn wagon for carrying hay.
word red may have emotional associations, or connotations, that depend on your response. A red sunset, for example, can have a positive connotation or a negative one depending on whether it is associated with the end of a perfect day or with air pollution. By choosing an image carefully, poets not only create pictures in a reader's mind, but also suggest a number of imaginative associations. These associations help poets establish the atmosphere or mood of the poem. The softly falling snow in "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" (p. 803), for example, creates a quiet, almost mystical mood.

Readers come to a poem with their own unique experiences. Yet an image in a poem does not always suggest the same thing to all readers. "Cloud Painter," for example, the poet presents the image of an oak tree clutching a rock. Although most readers will probably see a picture that is consistent with the one the poet sees, no two images will be identical. Every reader will have his or her own distinct mental image of a tree clinging to a rock; some images will be remembered experiences, whereas others will be imaginative creations. Some readers may even be familiar enough with the work of the painter John Constable to visualize a particular tree clinging to a particular rock in one of his paintings. By conveying what the poet sees and experiences, images open readers' minds and enrich their reading with perceptions and associations different from—and possibly more original and complex than—their own.

One advantage of imagery is its extreme economy. Just a few words enable poets to evoke a range of emotions and reactions. In the following poem, just a few visual images are enough to create a picture.

EZRA POUND
(1885-1972)

In a Station of the Metro
(1916)

The apparition of these faces in the crowd;
Petals on a wet, black bough.

The poem is almost impossible to paraphrase because the information it communicates is less important than the feelings associated with this information. The poem's title indicates that the first line is meant to suggest a group of people gathered in a station of the Paris subway. The scene, however, is presented not as a clear picture but as an "apparition," suggesting that it is unexpected or even dreamlike. In contrast with the image of the subway platform is the image of the people's faces as flower petals beside the dark branch of a tree. Thus, the subway platform—dark, cold, wet,
Some Good Things to Be Said for the Iron Age

A ringing tire iron dropped on the pavement Whang of a saw brushed on limbs
 s the taste of rust

Here Snyder presents two commonplace aural images: the ringing of a tire iron and the sound of a saw. These somewhat ordinary images gain power, however, through their visual isolation in the poem. Together they produce a harsh and jarring chord that in turn creates a sense of uneasiness in the reader. This poem does more than present sensory images, though; it also conveys the speaker's interpretations of these images. The last lines of the poem imply not only that the time in which we live (the Iron Age) is base and mundane, but also that it is declining, decaying into an age of rust. This idea is reinforced by the repeated consonant sounds of taste and rust, which encourage readers to hold the final image of the poem on their tongues. The title of the poem makes an ironic comment, suggesting that compared to the time that is approaching, the age of rust may be "good." Thus, in the mind of the poet, ordinary events gain special significance, and images that spring from everyday experience become sources of enlightenment and insight.

In shorter poems, such as most of those discussed earlier, one or more images may serve as focal points. A longer poem may introduce a cluster of related images, creating a more complex tapestry of sensory impressions—as in the following poem, where several related images are woven together.

The Meal

They have washed their faces until they are pale,
 their homework is beautifully complete.
 They wait for the adults to lean towards each other.
 The hands of the children are oval and smooth as pine-nuts.
 The girls have braided and rebraided their hair, tied ribbons without a single mistake.
 The boy has put away his coin collection.
 They are waiting for the mother to straighten her lipstick,
 and for the father to speak.

They gather around the table, carefully as constellations waiting to be named.
 Their minds shift and ready, like dunes.
 It is so quiet, all waiting stars and dunes.

Their forks move across their plates without scraping, they wait for the milk and the gravy
 at the table with its forgotten spices.
 They are waiting for a happiness to lift their eyes,
 like sudden light flaring in the trees outside.

The white miles of the meal continue,
 the figures still travel across a screen:
 the father carving the Sunday roast,
 her mouth uneven as a torn hibiscus,
 their braids still gleaming in the silence.

"The Meal" presents related images that together evoke silence, order, and emptiness. It begins with the image of faces washed "until they are pale" and goes on to describe the children's oval hands as "smooth as pine-nuts.
milk and the gravy" go on forever, reinforcing the sterility and emptiness of the Sun-practical. Suggesting an absence of sensation or feeling, a kind of paraly-the poem's images challenge conventional assumptions about the
and its rituals.
Much visual imagery is static, freezing the moment and thereby giving it the timeless quality of painting or sculpture. ("The Meal" presents just such a tableau, and so do "Red Wheelbarrow" and "In a Station of the Metro.") Some imagery, however, is kinetic, conveying a sense of motion or change.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS
(1883-1963)

The Great Figure
(1938)

Among the rain and lights
I saw the figure 5
in gold on a red firetruck moving tense unheeded to gong clangs siren howls and wheels rumbling through the dark city.

Commenting on this poem in his autobiography, Williams explained that while walking in New York, he heard the sound of a fire engine. As he turned the corner, he saw a golden figure 5 on a red background speeding by. The impression was so forceful that he immediately jotted down a poem about it. In the poem, Williams attempts to re-create the sensation the figure 5 made as it moved into his consciousness, presenting the image as if it were a picture taken by a camera with a high-speed shutter. The poet presents images in the order in which he perceived them: first the 5 and then the red fire truck howling and clanging into the darkness. Thus, "The Great Figure" uses images of sight, sound, and movement to re-create for the reader the poet's experience. The American painter Charles Demuth was fascinated by the kinetic quality of the poem. Working closely with his friend Williams, he attempted to capture the stop-action feature of the poem in the painting reproduced on page 653.

A special use of imagery, called synesthesia, occurs when one sense is described in a way that is more appropriate for another—for instance, when a sound is described with color. When people say they are feeling hot or describe music as hot, they are using synesthesia. The poet John Keats uses this technique in the following lines from "Ode to a Nightingale":

"For a draught of vintage that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep-delvèd earth,

Dancing Flora and the country green,

Dance and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth![/2]
In these lines, the speaker describes the taste of wine in terms of images that appeal to a variety of senses: flowers, a grassy field, and sun.

Poems for Further Reading: Imagery

Matsuo Basho
(1644-1694)

Four Haiku
Translated by Geoffrey Bowles and Anthony Thwaite

Spring:
A hill without a name
Veiled in morning mist.

The beginning of autumn:
Sea and emerald paddy
Both the same green.

The winds of autumn
Blow; yet still green
The chestnut husks.

A flash of lightning:
Into the gloom
Goes the heron’s cry.

Reading and Reacting

1. A haiku is a three-line poem, a Japanese form that traditionally has seventeen syllables. Haiku are admired for their extreme economy and their striking images. What are the central images in each of Basho’s haiku? To what senses do these images appeal?

2. In another poem, Basho says that art begins with “The depth of the country / and a rice-planting song.” What do you think he means? In what way do the preceding poems exemplify these words?

3. Do you think the conciseness of these poems increases or decreases the impact of their images?

Carolyn Kizer
(1925– )

After Basho
(1984)

Tentatively, you slip onstage this evening, pallid, famous moon.

Richard Wilbur
(1921– )

Sleepless at Crown Point
(1973)

All night, this headland
Lunges into the rumpling
Capework of the wind.

Related Works: “Photograph of My Father in His Twenty-Second Year” (p. 329), “Widow’s Lament” (p. 730), “Homage to the Empress of the Sun” (p. 807)
Nothing Gold Can Stay

Nature's first green is gold,
Her hardest hue to hold.
Her early leaf's a flower;
But only so an hour.
Then leaf subsides to leaf,
So Eden sinks to grief.
So dawn goes down to day.
Nothing gold can stay.

Reading and Reacting

1. What scene is the speaker describing?
2. What is the significance of the title?
3. What are the poem's central images? How do the words "hones" and "capework" help to establish these images?

Related Works: "The Story of an Hour" (p. 71), "Fog" (p. 82), "God's Grandeur" (p. 808), "Dance" (p. 846)

Reading and Reacting

1. What central idea does this poem express?
2. What do you think the line "nature's first green is gold" means? Is this line ironic?
3. What is the significance of the colors green and gold in this poem?
4. Journal Entry: How do the various images in the poem prepare readers for the last line?
5. Critical Perspective: In "The Figure a Poem Means," the introduction to the first edition of his Collected Poems (1930), Frost laid out a theory of poetry:

   It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification... but a momentary stay against confusion... Like a piece of ice on a hot stove the poem must ride on its own melting... Read it a hundred times: it will forever keep its freshness as a metal keeps its fragrance. It can never lose its sense of a meaning that once unfolded by surprise as it went.

Can you apply Frost's remarks to "Nothing Gold Can Stay"?

Related Works: "The Secret Lion" (p. 43), "Shall I Compare Thee to a Summer's Day?" (p. 662), "God's Grandeur" (p. 808)

Jean Toomer

(1894-1967)

Reapers

(1923)

Black reapers with the sound of steel on stones
Are sharpening scythes. I see them place the honed stones in their hip-pockets as a thing that's done,
And start their silent swinging, one by one.

Black horses drive a mower through the weeds,
And there, a field rat, startled, squealing bleeds,
His belly close to ground. I see the blade,
Blood-stained, continue cutting weeds and shade.

Reading and Reacting

1. What is the tone? What does it suggest about the workers?
2. Why do you think the first line of the poem suggests that the workers are content? What image contradicts this impression? How does it do so?
3. What ideas are traditionally associated with the image of the reaper? The scythe? The harvest? (You may want to consult a reference work, such as A Dictionary of Symbols by J. E. Cirlot.) In what way does the speaker rely on these conventional associations to help him convey his ideas? Can you appreciate the poem without understanding these associations?

Critical Perspective: As Brian Joseph Benson and Mabel Mayle Dillard point out in their 1980 study Jean Toomer, the poet disagreed with some other artists of the Harlem Renaissance, choosing not to focus on "Negro" themes for a primarily white audience. He used his poetry to convey an awareness of the "eternal universal" of human experience.
Chapter 15 • Imagery

Wilfred Owen (1893–1918)

Dulce et Decorum Est

(1920)

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
Coughing like hags, we cursed through sludge;
Till on the haunching flares we turn our backs
And towards our distant rest began to trudge.

Men marched asleep. Many had lost their boots
But limped on, blood-shod. All went lame; all blind;
Drunk with fatigue; deaf even to the hoots
Of tired, outstripped Five-Nines that dropped behind.

Gas! Gas! Quick, boys!—An ecstasy of fumbling,
Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time;
Someone still was yelling and stumbling
And flound'ring like a man in fire or lime...

Asapse a green sea, I saw him drowning.

If in some smothering dreams you too could pace Behind the wagon that we flung him in,
And watch the white eyes writhing in his face,
His hanging face, like a devil's sick of sin;
If you could hear, at every jolt, the blood
Gargling from the froth-corrupted lungs,
Obscene as cancer, bitter as the cud
Of vile, incurable sores on innocent tongues,—

My friend, you would not tell with such high zest
To children ardent for some desperate glory,
The old Lie: Dulce et decorum est
Pro patria mori.

1 The title and last lines are from Horace, Odes 3.2: "Sweet and one's country."
2 Shells that explode on impact and release poison gas.
1. How are short poems such as "Some Good Things to Be Said of Iron Age" (p. 650) and "In a Station of the Metro" (p. 649) like and unlike haiku?

2. Reread "Cloud Painter" (p. 646) and "The Great Figure" (p. 645) and read "Musée des Beaux Arts" (p. 771). Study the paintings accompanying the poems in the text. Then, write a paper in which you draw some conclusions about the differences between artistic and poetic images.

3. Reread "The Meal" (p. 651) and the discussion that accompanies it. Then, analyze the role of imagery in the depiction of the parent/child relationships in "My Papa's Waltz" (p. 531) and "Father's Wars" (p. 535). How does each poem's imagery complement nature of the relationship it describes?

4. Write an essay in which you discuss the color imagery in "Nothing Gold Can Stay" (p. 656), "Reapers" (p. 657), and "The Yellow Paper" (p. 152). In what way does color reinforce the themes of these works?

5. Sometimes imagery can be used to make a comment about the society in which a scene takes place. Choose two poems in which imagery functions in this way—"For the Union Dead" (p. 547), "The Colonel" (p. 742), or "The Chicago Defender Sends a Man to Little Rock" (p. 859), for example—and discuss how the images chosen reinforce the social statement each poem makes.
Ezra Pound (1885–1972)

In a Station of the Metro

The apparition of these faces in the crowd;
Petals on a wet, black bough.

Pound said he wrote this poem to convey an experience: emerging one day from a train in the Paris subway (Metro), he beheld “suddenly a beautiful face, and then another and another.” Originally he had described his impression in a poem thirty lines long. In this final version, each line contains an image, which, like a picture, may take the place of a thousand words.

Though the term image suggests a thing seen, when speaking of images in poetry, we generally mean a word or sequence of words that refers to any sensory experience. Often this experience is a sight (visual imagery, as in Pound’s poem), but it may be a sound (auditory imagery) or a touch (tactile imagery, as a perception of roughness or smoothness). It may be an odor or a taste or perhaps a bodily sensation such as pain, the prickling of gooseflesh, the quenching of thirst, or—as in the following brief poem—the perception of something cold.

Taniguchi Buson (1716–1783)

The piercing chill I feel
The piercing chill I feel:
your dead wife’s comb, in our bedroom,
under my heel . . .

As in this haiku (in Japanese, a poem of seventeen syllables) an image can convey a flash of understanding. Had he wished, the poet might have spoken of the dead woman, of the contrast between her death and his memory of her, of his feelings toward death in general. But such a discussion would be quite different from the poem he actually wrote. Striking his bare foot against the comb, now cold and motionless but associated with the living wife (perhaps worn in her hair), the widower feels a shock as if he had touched the woman’s corpse. A literal, physical sense of death is conveyed; the abstraction “death” is understood through the senses. To render the abstract in concrete terms is what poets often try to do; in this attempt, an image can be valuable.

IMAGERY

An image may occur in a single word, a phrase, a sentence, or, as in this case, an entire short poem. To speak of the imagery of a poem—all its images taken together—is often more useful than to speak of separate images. To divide Buson’s haiku into five images—chill, wife, comb, bedroom, heel—is possible, for any noun that refers to a visible object or a sensation is an image, but this is to draw distinctions that in themselves mean little and to disassemble a single experience.

Does an image cause a reader to experience a sense impression? Not quite. Reading the word petals, no one literally sees petals; but the occasion is given for imagining them. The image asks to be seen with the mind’s eye. And although “In a Station of the Metro” records what Ezra Pound saw, it is of course not necessary for a poet actually to have lived through a sensory experience in order to write of it. Keats may never have seen a newly discovered planet through a telescope, despite the image in his sonnet on Chapman’s Homer.

It is tempting to think of imagery as mere decoration, particularly when we read Keats, who fills his poems with an abundance of sights, sounds, odors, and tastes. But a successful image is not just a dab of paint or a flashy bauble. When Keats opens “The Eve of St. Agnes” with what have been called the coldest lines in literature, he evokes a series of images setting a mood:

St. Agnes’ eve—Ah, bitter chill it was!
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
The hare limped trembling through the frozen grass,And silent was the flock in woolly fold:

Indeed, some literary critics look for much of the meaning of a poem in its imagery, wherein they expect to see the mind of the poet more truly revealed than in whatever the poet explicitly claims to believe. Though Shakespeare’s Theseus (in A Midsummer Night’s Dream) accuses poets of being concerned with “airy nothings,” poets are usually very much concerned with what is in front of them. This concern is of use to us. Involved in our personal hopes and apprehensions, anticipating the future so hard that much of the time we see the present through a film of thought across our eyes, perhaps we need a poet occasionally to remind us that even the coffee we absentmindedly sip comes in (as Yeats put it) a “heavy spillable cup.”
T. S. Eliot (1888–1965)

The winter evening settles down
The winter evening settles down
With smell of steaks in passageways.
Six o'clock.
The burnt-out ends of smoky days.
And now a gusty shower wraps
The grimy scraps
Of withered leaves about your feet
And newspapers from vacant lots;
The showers beat
On broken blinds and chimney-pots,
And at the corner of the street
A lonely cab-horse steams and stamps.
And then the lighting of the lamps.

Questions
1. What mood is evoked by the images in Eliot's poem?
2. What kind of city neighborhood has the poet chosen to describe? How can you tell?

---

Theodore Roethke (1908–1963)

Root Cellar

Nothing would sleep in that cellar, dank as a ditch,
Bulbs broke out of boxes hunting for chinks in the dark,
Shoots dangled and drooped,
Lolling obscenely from mildewed crates,
Hung down long yellow evil necks, like tropical snakes.
And what a congress of stinks!—
Roots ripe as old bait,
Pulpy stems, rank, silo-rich,
Leaf-mold, manure, lime, piled against slippery planks.
Nothing would give up life:
Even the dirt kept breathing a small breath.

Questions
1. As a boy growing up in Saginaw, Michigan, Theodore Roethke spent much of his time in a large commercial greenhouse run by his family. What details in his poem show more than a passing acquaintance with growing things?
2. What varieties of image does "Root Cellar" contain? Point out examples.
3. What do you understand to be Roethke's attitude toward the root cellar? Does he view it as a disgusting chamber of horrors? Pay special attention to the last two lines.

---

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979)

The Fish

I caught a tremendous fish and held him beside the boat half out of water, with my hook fast in a corner of his mouth.
He didn't fight.
He hadn't fought at all.
He hung a grunting weight, battered and venerable and homely. Here and there his brown skin hung in strips like ancient wallpaper, and its pattern of darker brown was like wallpaper:
shapes like full-blown roses stained and lost through age.
He was speckled with barnacles, fine rosettes of lime,
and infested
with tiny white sea-lice, and underneath two or three rags of green weed hung down.
While his gills were breathing in the terrible oxygen
—the frightening gills,
fresh and crisp with blood,
that can cut so badly—
I thought of the coarse white flesh packed in like feathers.
I looked into his eyes which were far larger than mine but shallower, and yellowed, the irises
backed and packed with tarnished tinfoil seen through the lenses of old scratchedisiniglass.
They shifted a little, but not to return my stare.
—It was more like the tipping of an object toward the light.
I admired his sullen face,
the mechanism of his jaw,
and then I saw that from his lower lip
—if you could call it a lip—
grim, wet, and weaponlike, hung five old pieces of fish-line,
or four and a wire leader with the swivel still attached, with all their five big hooks grown firmly in his mouth.
A green line, frayed at the end where he broke it, two heavier lines, and a fine black thread still crimped from the strain and snap when it broke and he got away.
Like medals with their ribbons
frayed and wavering, a five-haired beard of wisdom trailing from his aching jaws.
I stared and stared and victory filled up
the little rented boat.
from the pool of bilge
where oil had spread a rainbow around the rusted engine to the bailer rusted orange,
the sun-cracked thwarts,
the oarlocks on their strings,
the gunnels—until everything was rainbow, rainbow, rainbow!
And I let the fish go.

Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926)
The Panther

In the Jardin des Plantes, Paris

His vision, from the constantly passing bars, has grown so weary that it cannot hold anything else. It seems to him there are two thousand bars; and behind the bars, no world.
As he paces in cramped circles, over and over,
the movement of his powerful soft strides is like a ritual dance around a center in which a mighty will stands paralyzed.
Only at times, the curtain of the pupils lifts, quietly—. An image enters in, rushes down through the tensed, arrested muscles,
plunges into the heart and is gone.

—Translated by Stephen Mitchell

Charles Simic (b. 1938)
Fork

This strange thing must have crept
Right out of hell.
It resembles a bird's foot
Worn around the cannibal's neck.
As you hold it in your hand,
As you stab with it into a piece of meat,
It is possible to imagine the rest of the bird:
Its head which like your fist
Is large, bald, beakless, and blind.

Questions
1. What is meant by "the curtain of the pupils" (line 9)?
2. What is communicated by the image of the "image" in the last three lines?
A Route of Evanescence
(1830-1886)

Emily Dickinson

A Route of Evanescence
With a revolving Wheel –
A Resonance of Emerald –
A Rush of Cochineal* –
And every Blossom on the Bush
Adjusts its tumbled Head –
The mail from Tunis, probably,
An easy Morning’s Ride –

A ROUTE OF EVANESCENCE. Dickinson titled this poem “A Humming-bird” in an 1880 letter to a friend. 1 Evanescence; ornithologist’s term for the luminous sheen of certain birds’ feathers. 2 Tunis: capital city of Tunisia, North Africa.

Questions
What is the subject of this poem? How can you tell?

Jean Toomer

Reapers
(1894-1967)

1923

Black reapers with the sound of steel on stones
Are sharpening scythes. I see them place the hones
In their hip-pockests as a thing that’s done,
And start their silent swinging, one by one.
Black horses drive a mower through the weeds,
And there, a field rat, startling, squealing bleeds,
His belly close to ground. I see the blade,
Blood-stained, continue cutting weeds and shade.

Questions
1. Imagine the scene Toomer describes. What details most vividly strike the mind’s eye?
2. What kind of image is silent swinging?
3. Read the poem aloud. Notice especially the effect of the words sound of steel on stones and field rat, startled, squealing bleeds. What interesting sounds are present in the very words that contain these images?
4. What feelings do you get from this poem as a whole? Besides appealing to our auditory and visual imagination, what do the images contribute?

Gerard Manley Hopkins

Pied Beauty
(1844-1889)

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple-color as a brinded* cow;
For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls; finches’ wings;
Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plow;

All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adable, dim;
He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:
Praise him.

Questions
1. What does the word pied mean? (Hint: what does a Pied Piper look like?)
2. According to Hopkins, what do skies, cow, trout, ripe chestnuts, finches’ wings, and landscapes all have in common? What landscapes can the poet have in mind? (Have you ever seen any dappled landscape while looking down from an airplane, or from a mountain or high hill?!) 3. What do you make of line 6: what can carpenters’ saws and ditch-diggers’ spades possibly have in common with the dappled things in lines 2-4?
4. Does Hopkins refer only to visual contrasts? What other kinds of variation interest him?
5. Try to state in your own words the theme of this poem. How essential to our understanding of this theme are Hopkins’s images?

ABOUT HAIKU

Arakida Moritake
(1473-1549)

The falling flower
The falling flower
I saw drift back to the branch
Was a butterfly.

—Translated by Babette Deutsch

Haiku means “beginning-verse” in Japanese—perhaps because the form may have originated in a game. Players, given a haiku, were supposed to extend its three lines into a longer poem. Haiku (the word can also be plural) consist mainly of imagery, but as we saw in Buson’s lines about the cold comb, their imagery is not always only pictorial; it can involve any of the five senses. Haiku are so short that they depend on imagery to trigger associations and responses in the reader. A haiku in Japanese is rimeless; its seventeen syllables are traditionally arranged in three lines, usually following a pattern of five, seven, and five syllables. English haiku frequently ignore such a pattern, being rimed or unrimed as the poet prefers. What English haiku do try to preserve is the powerful way Japanese haiku capture the intensity of a particular moment, usually by linking two concrete images. There is little room for abstract thoughts or general observations. The following attempt, though containing seventeen syllables, is far from haiku in spirit:

Now that our love is gone
I feel within my soul
a nagging distress.

Unlike the author of those lines, haiku poets look out upon a literal world, seldom looking inward to discuss their feelings. Japanese haiku tend to be seasonal in subject, indicates spring; a crow on a branch, autumn; snow, winter. Not just pretty little sketches of nature (as some Westerners think), haiku assume a view of the universe in which observer and nature are not separated.

Haiku emerged in sixteenth-century Japan and soon developed into a deeply esteemed form. Even today, Japanese soldiers, stockbrokers, scientists, schoolchildren, and the emperor himself still find occasion to pen haiku. Soon after the form first captured the attention of Western poets at the end of the nineteenth century, it became immensely influential for modern poets such as Ezra Pound, William Carlos Williams, and H. D., as a model for the kind of verse they wanted to write—concise, direct, and imagistic.

The Japanese consider the poems of the “Three Masters”—Basho, Buson, and Issa—to be the pinnacle of the classical haiku. Each poet had his own personality: Basho, the ascetic seeker of Zen enlightenment; Buson, the worldly artist; Issa, the sensitive master of wit and pathos. Here are free translations of poems from each of the “Three Masters.”

Matsuo Basho (1644-1694)

Heat-lightning streak
Heat-lightning streak—
through darkness pierces
the heron’s shriek.

In the old stone pool
In the old stone pool
a frog jumps:
splishhhhh.

—Translated by X. J. Kennedy
—Translated by X. J. Kennedy

Taniguchi Buson (1716-1783)

Moonrise on mudflats
On the one-ton temple bell a moonmoth, folded into sleep, sits still.

Moonrise on mudflats,
the line of water and sky
blurred by a bullfrog

—Translated by X. J. Kennedy
—Translated by Michael Stillman

Kobayashi Issa (1763-1827)

only one guy only one guy and only one fly trying to make the guest room do.

Cricket
Cricket, be careful! I’m rolling over!

—Translated by Cid Corman
—Translated by Robert Bly

Contemporary Haiku

If you care to try your hand at haiku-writing, here are a few suggestions: make every word matter. Include few adjectives, shunt needless conjunctions. Set your poem in the present. (“Haiku,” said Basho, “is simply what is happening in this place at this moment.”) Like many writers of haiku, you may wish to confine your poem to what can be seen, heard, smelled, tasted, or touched. Mere sensory reports, however, will be meaningless unless they make the reader feel something.

Here are six more recent haiku written in English. (Don’t expect them all to observe a strict arrangement of seventeen syllables, however.) Haiku, in any language, is an art of few words, many suggestions. A haiku starts us thinking and telling.

Suiko Matsushita

Cosmos in bloom
Cosmos in bloom
as if no war
were taking place

—Translated by Violet Kazue de Cristoro

Hakuro Wada

Even the croaking of frogs
Even the croaking of frogs comes from outside the barbed wire fence
this is our life

—Translated by Violet Kazue de Cristoro

Etheridge Knight (1931-1991)

Making jazz swing in Making jazz swing in Seventeen syllables AIN’T
No square poet’s job.

Lee Gurga (b. 1949)

Visitor’s Room
Visitor’s Room—
everything bolted down except my brother.

Penny Harter (b. 1940)

Born Again
Born Again
she speaks excitedly of death.

Jennifer Brutschy (b. 1960)

broken bowl broken bowl
the pieces still rocking.

John Ridland (b. 1933)

The Lazy Man’s Haiku out in the night
a wheelbarrowful of moonlight.

Gary Gay (b. 1951)

Hole in the ozone
Hole in the ozone
My bald spot . . .
sunburned

Haiku from Japanese Internment Camps

Japanese immigrants brought the tradition of haiku-writing to the United States, often forming local clubs to pursue their shared literary interests. During World War II, when Japanese Americans were unjustly considered “enemy aliens” and confined to federal internment camps, these poets continued to write in their bleak new surroundings. Today these haiku provide a vivid picture of the deprivations suffered by the poets, their families, and their fellow internees.
FOR REVIEW AND FURTHER STUDY

John Keats (1795-1821)

Bright Star! would I were steadfast as thou art
Not in lone splendor hung aloft the night,
And watching, with eternal lids apart,
Like Nature's patient, sleepless Eremite,
The moving waters at their priest-like task
Of pure ablution round earth's human shores,
Or gazing on the new soft-fallen mask
Of snow upon the mountains and the moors—
No—yet still steadfast, still unchangeable,
Pillowed upon my fair love's ripening breast,
To feel for ever its soft fall and swell,
Awake for ever in a sweet unrest,
Still, still to hear her tender-taken breath,
And so live ever—or else swoon to death.

Questions
1. Scars are conventional symbols for love and a loved one. (Love, Shakespeare tells us in a sonnet, "is the star to every wandering bark.") In this sonnet, why is it not possible for the star to have this meaning? How does Keats use it?
2. What seems concrete and particular in the speaker's observations?
3. Suppose Keats had said slow and easily instead of tender-taken in line 13. What would have been lost?

Experiment: Writing with Images
Taking the following poems as examples from which to start rather than as models to be slavishly copied, try to compose a brief poem that consists largely of imagery.

Walt Whitman (1819-1892)

The Runner

On a flat road runs the well-train'd runner;
He is lean and sinewy, with muscular legs;
He is thinly clothed—he leans forward as he runs,
With lightly closed fists, and arms partially rais'd.

T. E. Hulme (1883-1917)

Image

Old houses were scaffolding once and workmen whistling.

William Carlos Williams (1883-1963)

El Hombre

It's a strange courage
You give me ancient star:
Shine alone in the sunrise
Toward which you lend no part!

Robert Bly (b. 1928)

Driving to Town Late to Mail a Letter

It is a cold and snowy night. The main street is deserted.
The only things moving are swirls of snow.
As I lift the mailbox door, I feel its cold iron.
There is a privacy I love in this snowy night.
Driving around, I will waste more time.

Paul Goodman (1911-1972)

Birthday Cake

Now isn't it time when the candles on the icing are one too many too many to blow out too many to count too many isn't it time to give up this ritual?
although the fiery crown fluttering on the chocolate and through the darkened room advancing is still the most loveliest sight among our savage folk that have few festivals.

But the thicket is too hot and thick and isn't it time, isn't it time when the fires are too many to eat the fire and not the cake and drip the fires from my teeth as once I had my hot hot youth.
Louise Glück (b. 1943)

Mock Orange

It is not the moon, I tell you.
It is these flowers
lighting the yard.
I hate them.
I hate them as I hate sex,
the man's mouth sealing my mouth, the man’s paralyzing body—
and the cry that always escapes, the low, humiliating premise of union—
In my mind tonight
I hear the question and pursuing answer fused in one sound that mounts and mounts and then is split into the old selves, the tired antagonisms. Do you see?
We were made fools of.
And the scent of mock orange drifts through the window.

How can I rest?
How can I be content when there is still that odor in the world?

Mock Orange. The mock orange is a flowering shrub with especially fragrant white blossoms and fruit that resemble those of an orange tree.

---

Billy Collins (b. 1941)

Embrace

You know the parlor trick.
Wrap your arms around your own body and from the back it looks like someone is embracing you,
her hands grasping your shirt,
her fingernails teasing your neck.
From the front it is another story.
You never looked so alone,
your crossed elbows and screwy grin.
You could be waiting for a tailor to fit you for a straitjacket, one that would hold you really tight.

---

Kevin Prufer (b. 1969)

Pause, Pause

Praise to the empty schoolroom, when the folders are stowed and the sighing desks close.
Praise to the sixteen-hour silence
after the last chairleg complains against the tiles.
There are tracks in the snow on the sidewalk, icc salting into the bootprints. Snow clots fall like good advice from the branches.
See the plaid skirts ticking into the distance!
The bookbags swaying to the footfalls?
Praise to the sun. It sets like a clocktower face, oranges over, grows. Praise, praise to the classrooms, empty at last.

One by one, the door-bolts click and the lightbulbs shudder to a close.
The chairs dream all askew. Praise to the empty hallway, the pause before the long bells cry.

---

Stevie Smith (1902-1971)

Not Waving but Drowning

Nobody heard him, the dead man,
But still he lay moaning:
I was much further out than you thought
And not waving but drowning.

Poor chap, he always loved larking
And now he's dead
It must have been too cold for him his heart gave way,
They said.

Oh, no no no, it was too cold always (Still the dead one lay moaning)
I was much too far out all my life
And not waving but drowning.
Irony is that little pinch of salt which alone makes the dish palatable.

—JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE

2

LISTENING TO A VOICE

TONE

In old Western movies, when one hombre taunts another, it is customary for the second to drawl, "Smile when you say that, pardner" or "Mister, I don't like your tone of voice." Sometimes in reading a poem, although we can neither see a face nor hear a voice, we can infer the poet's attitude from other evidence.

Like tone of voice, tone in literature often conveys an attitude toward the person addressed. Like the manner of a person, the manner of a poem may be friendly or bellicose, toward its reader, condescending or respectful. Again like tone of voice, the tone of a poem may tell us how the speaker feels about himself or herself: cocksure or humble, sad or glad. But usually when we ask, "What is the tone of a poem?" we mean, "What attitude does the poet take toward a theme or a subject?" Is the poet being affectionate, hostile, earnest, playful, sarcastic, or what? We may never be able to know, of course, the poet's personal feelings. All we need know is how to feel when we read the poem.

Strictly speaking, tone isn't an attitude; it is whatever in the poem makes an attitude clear to us: the choice of certain words instead of others, the picking out of certain details. In A. E. Housman's "Loveliest of trees," for example, the poet communicates his admiration for a cherry tree's beauty by singling out its white blossoms for attention; had he wanted to show his dislike for the tree, he might have concentrated on its broken branches, birdlime, or snails. To perceive the tone of a poem rightly, we need to read the poem carefully, paying attention to whatever suggestions we find in it.

Theodore Roethke (1908–1963)

My Papa's Waltz

The whiskey on your breath
Could make a small boy dizzy;
But I hung on like death:
Such waltzing was not easy.

1948
We tamped until the pans
Slid from the kitchen shelf;
My mother's countenance
Could not unfrown itself.

The hand that held my wrist
Was battered on one knuckle;
At every step you missed
My right ear scraped a buckle.

You beat time on my head
With a palm caked hard by dirt,
Then waltzed me off to bed
Still clinging to your shirt.

What is the tone of this poem? Most readers find the speaker's attitude toward his father critical, yet nonetheless affectionate. They take this recollection of childhood to be an odd but happy one. Other readers, however, concentrate on other details, such as the father's rough manners and drunkenness. One reader has written that "Roethke expresses his resentment for his father, a drunken brute with dirty hands and whiskey breath who carelessly hurt the child's ear and manhandled him."

Although this reader accurately noticed some of the events in the poem and perceived that there was something desperate in the son's hanging onto the father "like death," he simplifies the tone of the poem and so misses its humorous side.

While "My Papa's Waltz" contains the dark elements of manhandling and drunkenness, the tone remains grotesquely comic. The rollicking rhythms of the poem underscore Roethke's complex humor—half loving and half censuring of the unwashed, intoxicated father. The humor is further reinforced by playful times such as dizzy and easy, knuckle and buckle, as well as the joyful suggestions of the words Waltz, Waltzing, and romped. The scene itself is comic, with kitchen pans falling because of the father's roughhousing while the mother looks on unamused. However much the speaker satirizes the overly rambunctious father, he does not have the heat for his father critical, but nonetheless his father affectionate.

Certainly, the small boy's family life has its frightening side, but the last line suggests the boy is still clinging to his father with persistent if also complicated love.

Satiric Poetry
"My Papa's Waltz," though it includes lifelike details that aren't pretty, has a tone relatively easy to recognize. So does satiric poetry, a kind of comic poetry that generally conveys a message. Usually its tone is one of detached amusement, withering contempt, and implied superiority. In a satiric poem, the poet ridicules some person or persons (or perhaps some kind of human behavior), examining the victim by the light of certain principles and implying that the reader, too, ought to feel contempt for the victim.

Questions
1. What is Cullen's message?
2. How would you characterize the tone of this poem? Wrathful? Amused?

A Spectrum of Tones
In some poems the poet's attitude may be plain enough; while in other poems attitudes may be so mingled that it is hard to describe them tersely without doing injustice to the poem. Does Andrew Marvell in "To His Coy Mistress" (page 440) take a serious or playful attitude toward the fact that he and his lady are destined to be food for worms? No one-word answer will suffice. And what of T. S. Eliot's "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (page 369)? In his attitude toward his redemption-seeking hero who wades with trousers rolled, Eliot is seriously funny. Such a mingled tone may be seen in the following poem by the wife of a governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony and the earliest American poet of note. Anne Bradstreet's first book, The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America (1650), had been published in England without her consent. She wrote these lines to preface a second edition:

Anne Bradstreet (1612?-1672)
The Author to Her Book
Thou ill-formed offspring of my feeble brain,
Who after birth didst by my side remain,
Till snatch'd from thence by friends, less wise than true,
Who thee abroad exposed to public view;
Made thee in rags, haling, to the press to trudge,
Where errors were not lessen'd, all may judge.
At thy return my blushing was not small,
My rambling brat (in print) should mother call;
I cast thee by as one unfit for light,
Thy visage was so irksome in my sight;
Yet being mine own, at length affection would Thy blemishes amend, if so I could:
I wash'd thy face, but more defects I saw,
And rubbing off a spot, still made a flaw;
I stretched thy joints to make thee even feet,
Yet still thou run'st more hobbling than is meet;
In better dress to trim thee was my mind,
But nought save homespun cloth in the house I find.
In this array, 'mongst vulgar may'st thou roam;
In critics' hands beware thou dost not come;
And take thy way where yet thou art not known.
If for thy Father asked, say thou hast't none;
And for thy Mother, she alas is poor,
Which caused her thus to send thee out of door.
In the author's comparison of her book to an illegitimate ragamuffin, we may be
Emily Dickinson (1830-1886)

I like to see it lap the Miles
And lick the Valleys up—
And stop to feed itself at Tanks—
And then—prodigious step

Around a Pile of Mountains—
And sup:ecilious peer
In Shanties—by the sides of Roads—
And then a Quarry pare

To fit its Ribs
And crawl between Complaining all the while
In horrid—hooting stauta—
Then chase itself down Hill—

And neigh like Boanerges—
Then—punctual as a Star
Stop—docile and omnipotent
At its own stable door—

Questions
1. What differences in tone do you find between Whitman's and Dickinson's poems? Point out whatever in each poem contributes to these differences.
2. Boanerges in Dickinson's last stanza means "sons of thunder," a name given by Jesus to the disciples John and James (see Mark 3:17). How far should the reader work out the particulars of this comparison? Does it make the tone of the poem serious?
3. In Whitman's opening line, what is a relective? What other specialized terms from the vocabulary of music and poetry does each poem contain? How do they help underscore Whitman's theme?
4. Poets and songwriters probably have regarded the locomotive with more affection than they have shown most other machines. Why do you suppose this is so? Can you think of any other poems or songs as examples?
5. What do these two poems tell you about locomotives that you would not be likely to find in a technical book on railroading?
6. Are the subjects of the two poems identical? Discuss.

Kevin Young (b. 1970)

Doo Wop
Honey baby
Lady lovely
Milk shake your money maker
Questions
1. What is the tone of this poem—confused or serious? Both at once?
2. How many instances of play on words and playing with the sounds of words can you find in the poem?
3. Beyond the author's exuberant delight in language, what do you think "Doo Wop" is about?

Weldon Kees (1914–1955)

For My Daughter

Looking into my daughter's eyes I read
Beneath the innocence of morning flesh
Concealed, hintings of death she does not heed.
Coldest of winds have blown this hair, and mesh
Of seaweed snarled these miniatures of hands;
The night's slow poison, tolerant and bland,
Has moved her blood. Parched years that I have seen
That may be hers appear: foul, lingering
Death in certain war, the slim legs green.
Or, fed on hate, she relishes the sting
Of others' agony; perhaps the cruel
Bride of a syphilitic or a fool.
These speculations sour in the sun.
I have no daughter. I desire none.

Questions
1. How does the last line of this sonnet affect the meaning of the poem?
2. "For My Daughter" was first published in 1940. What considerations might a potential American parent have felt at that time? Are these historical concerns mirrored in the poem?
3. Donald Justice has said that "Kees is one of the bitterest poets in history." Is bitterness the
IRONY

To see a distinction between the poet and the words of a fictitious character—between Robert Browning and "My Last Duchess"—is to be aware of irony: a manner of speaking that implies a discrepancy. If the mask says one thing and we sense that the writer is in fact saying something else, the writer has adopted an ironic point of view. No finer illustration exists in English than Jonathan Swift's "A Modest Proposal," an essay in which Swift speaks as an earnest, humorless citizen who sets forth his reasonable plan to aid the Irish poor. The plan is so monstrous no sane reader can assent to it: the poor are to sell their children as meat for the tables of their landlords. From behind his false face, Swift is actually recommending not cannibalism but love and Christian charity.

A poem is often made complicated and more interesting by another kind of irony. Verbal irony occurs whenever words say one thing but mean something else, usually the opposite. The word love means hate here: "I just love to stay home and do my hair on a Saturday night!"

Sarcasm

If verbal irony is conspicuously bitter, heavy-handed, and mocking, it is sarcasm: "Oh, he's the biggest spender in the world, all right!" (The sarcasm, if that statement were spoken, would be underscored by the speaker's tone of voice.) A famous instance of sarcasm occurs in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar in Mark Antony's oration over the body of the slain Caesar: "Brutus is an honorable man." Antony repeats this line until the enraged populace begins shouting exactly what he means to call Brutus and the other conspirators: traitors, villains, murderers. We had best be alert for irony on the printed page, for if we miss it, our interpretations of a poem may go wild.

Robert Creeley (1926-2005)

Oh No

If you wander far enough
you will come to it and when you get there they will give you a place to sit for yourself only, in a nice chair, and all your friends will be there with smiles on their faces and they will likewise have places.

This poem is rich in verbal irony. The title helps point out that between the speaker's words and attitude lie deep differences. In line 2, what is it? Old age? The wandering suggests a conventional metaphor: the journey of life. Is it literally a rest home for "senior citizens," or perhaps some naive popular concept of heaven (such as we meet in comic strips: harps, angels with hoops for halos) in which the saved all sit around in a ring, smugly congratulating one another? We can't be sure, but the speaker's attitude toward this final sitting-place is definite. It is a place for the selfish, as we infer from the phrase for yourself only. And smiles on their faces may hint that the smiles are unchanging and forced. There is a difference between saying "They had smiles on their faces" and "They smiled", the latter suggests that the smiles came from within. The word nice is to be regarded with distrust. If we see through this speech or action, for the playwright has afforded us superior knowledge. In Sophocles' King Oedipus, when Oedipus vows to punish whoever has brought down a plague upon the city of Thebes, we know—as he does not—that the man he would punish is himself. The situation of Oedipus also contains cosmic irony; or irony of fate: some Fate with a grim sense of humor seems cruelly to trick a human being. Cosmic irony clearly exists in poems in which Fate or the Fates are personified and seen as hostile, as in Thomas Hardy's "The Convergence of the Twain" (page 421); and it may be said to occur also in Robinson's "Richard Cory" (page 128). Obviously it is a twist of fate for the most envied man in town to kill himself.

To sum up: the effect of irony depends on the reader's noticing some incongruity or discrepancy between two things. In verbal irony, there is a contrast between the speaker's words and meaning; in an ironic point of view, between the writer's attitude and what is spoken by a fictitious character; in dramatic irony, between the limited knowledge of a character and the fuller knowledge of the reader or spectator; in cosmic irony, between a character's position or aspiration and the treatment he or she receives at the hands of Fate. Although, in the work of an inept poet, irony can be crude and obvious sarcasm, it is invaluable to a poet of more complicated mind, who imagines more than one perspective.

Irony 55

Dramatic Irony

Dramatic irony, like verbal irony, contains an element of contrast, but it usually refers to a situation in a play wherein a character whose knowledge is limited says, does, or encounters something of greater significance than he or she knows. We, the spectators, realize the meaning of this speech or action, for the playwright has afforded us superior knowledge. In Sophocles' King Oedipus, when Oedipus vows to punish whoever has brought down a plague upon the city of Thebes, we know—as he does not—that the man he would punish is himself. The situation of Oedipus also contains cosmic irony; or irony of fate: some Fate with a grim sense of humor seems cruelly to trick a human being. Cosmic irony clearly exists in poems in which Fate or the Fates are personified and seen as hostile, as in Thomas Hardy's "The Convergence of the Twain" (page 421); and it may be said to occur also in Robinson's "Richard Cory" (page 128). Obviously it is a twist of fate for the most envied man in town to kill himself.

To sum up: the effect of irony depends on the reader's noticing some incongruity or discrepancy between two things. In verbal irony, there is a contrast between the speaker's words and meaning; in an ironic point of view, between the writer's attitude and what is spoken by a fictitious character; in dramatic irony, between the limited knowledge of a character and the fuller knowledge of the reader or spectator; in cosmic irony, between a character's position or aspiration and the treatment he or she receives at the hands of Fate. Although, in the work of an inept poet, irony can be crude and obvious sarcasm, it is invaluable to a poet of more complicated mind, who imagines more than one perspective.

W. H. Auden  (1907–1973)
The Unknown Citizen
(TuJS/07M/378
This Marble Monument Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint,
For in everything he did served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired
He worked in a factory and never got tired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn't a scob or odd in his views,
For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found

That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day
And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.

Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured.
And his Health-card shows he was once in hospital but left it cured.
Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Installment Plan
And had everything necessary to the Modern Man,
A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.

Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace; when there was war, he went.
He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his

And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

Questions
1. Read the two-line epitaph at the beginning of the poem as carefully as you read what follows. How does the epitaph help establish the voice by which the rest of the poem is spoken?
2. Who is speaking?
3. What ironic discrepancies do you find between the speaker's attitude toward the subject and that of the poet himself? By what is the poet's attitude made clear?
4. In the phrase "The Unknown Soldier" (of which "The Unknown Citizen" reminds us), what does the word unknown mean? What does it mean in the title of Auden's poem?
5. What tendencies in our civilization does Auden satirize?
6. How would you expect the speaker to define a Modern Man, if a CD player, a radio, a car, and a refrigerator are "everything" a Modern Man needs?

Sharon Olds  (b. 1942)
Rite of Passage

As the guests arrive at my son's party
they gather in the living room—
short men, men in first grade
with smooth jaws and chins.

Hands in pockets, they stand around jostling, jockeying for place, small fights
breaking out and calming. One says to another
How old are you? Six, I'm seven. So?

They eye each other, seeing themselves
tiny in the eyes of others. Tiny, mere figures.

And had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

Sharon Olds  (b. 1942)
Rite of Passage

As the guests arrive at my son's party
they gather in the living room—
short men, men in first grade
with smooth jaws and chins.

Hands in pockets, they stand around
jostling, jockeying for place, small fights
breaking out and calming. One says to another
How old are you? Six, I'm seven. So?

They eye each other, seeing themselves
tiny in the eyes of others. Tiny, mere figures.

And had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.
Irony

1. What is ironic about the way the speaker describes the first-grade boys at her son’s birthday party?
2. What other irony does the author underscore in the last two lines?
3. Does this mother sentimentalize her own son by seeing him as better than the other little boys?

Rod Taylor (b. 1947)

Dakota: October, 1822: Hunkpapa Warrior

New air has come around us.
It is cold enough to make us know we are different from the things we touch. Before dark, we ride along the high places or go deep in the long grass at the edge of our people and watch for enemies.
We are the strongest tribe of the Sioux. Buffalo are plentiful, our women beautiful. Life is good.
What bad thing can be done against us?

DAKOTA: OCTOBER, 1822: HUNKPAPA WARRIOR. The Hunkpapa are one of seven branches of the Lakota Sioux tribe.

Questions
1. How would you describe the speaker’s tone—confident, boastful, serene?
2. What is ironic about this poem?
3. What kind of irony does the poem display?

Sarah N. Cleghorn (1876–1959)

The Golf Links

The golf links lie so near the mill
That almost every day
The laboring children can look out

Questions
1. Is this brief poem satiric? Does it contain any verbal irony or is the poet making a matter-of-fact statement in words that mean just what they say?
2. What other kind of irony is present in the poem?
3. Sarah N. Cleghorn’s poem dates from before the enactment of legislation against child labor. Is it still a good poem, or is it hopelessly dated?
4. Would you call this poem lyric, narrative, or didactic?

Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950)

Second Fig

Safe upon the solid rock the ugly houses stand:
Come and see my shining palace built upon the sand!

Questions
Do you think the author is making fun of the speaker’s attitude or agreeing with it?

Dorothy Parker (1893–1967)

Comment
Oh, life is a glorious cycle of song,
A medley of extemporanea;
And love is a thing that can never go wrong;
And I am Marie of Roumania.

COMMENT. Marie of Roumania: Princess Marie of Edinburgh (1875–1938), a granddaughter of Queen Victoria, was married in 1893 to Prince Ferdinand of Romania, who ascended the throne in 1914.

Questions
1. Is Marie of Roumania the speaker of the poem?
2. How serious is the poem’s tone? Consider the rhythm and the rhymes in lines 2 and 4.
3. In actuality, Queen Marie of Roumania had an unhappy life. Does this fact add another level of irony to the poem?

Bob Hicok (b. 1960)

Making it in poetry

The young teller
at the credit union asked why so many small checks
from universities?
Because I write poems I said. Why haven’t I heard of you! Because I write poems
Questions
1. Is the title of this poem ironic or not? Explain your answer.
2. Both of the teller's questions are answered the same way. Is there irony in that fact?
3. Do you find any significance in the description of the teller as "young"?

Exercise: Detecting Irony
Point out the kinds of irony that occur in the following poem.

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928)
The Workbox
"See, here's the workbox, little wife,
That I made of polished oak."
He was a joiner," of village life;
She came of borough folk.

He holds the present up to her
As with a smile she nears
And answers to the profferer,
"I warrant it will. And longer too.
'Tis a scantling that I got Off poor John Wayward's coffin, who Died of they knew not what.

"The shingled pattern that seems to cease
Against your box's rim
Continues right on in the piece
That's underground with him.

"And while I worked it made me think
Of timber's varied doom:
One inch where people eat and drink,
The next inch in a tomb.

"But why do you look so white, my dear,
And turn aside your face?
You knew not that good lad, I fear,
Though he came from your native place?"

"How could I know that good young man,
Though he came from my native town,
When he must have left far earlier than
I was a woman grown?"

"Ah, no. I should have understood!
It shocked you that I gave
To you one end of a piece of wood Whose other is in a grave!"

Questions
1. What does Blake's poem reveal about conditions of life in the London of his day?
2. What do you find in common with "The Golf Links" (page 36)?
3. Sum up your impressions of the speaker's character. What does he say and do that displays it to us?
Questions

1. What nonevent does this poem celebrate? What is the speaker's attitude toward it?
2. The speaker describes an empty field. What is odd about the way in which he describes it?
3. What does the speaker appear to use ironically?

Exercise: Telling Tone
Here are two radically different poems on a similar subject. Try stating the theme of each poem in your own words. How is tone (the speaker's attitude) different in the two poems?

Richard Lovelace (1618-1658)

To Lucasta (1649)

On Going to the Wars

Tell me not, Sweet, I am unkind
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

True, a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field:
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconscancy is such
As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, Dear, so much,
Loved I not Honor more.

Wilfred Owen (1893-1918)

Dulce et Decorum Est (1920)

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
Knock-kneed, coughing like hags, we cursed through sludge,
Till on the haunting flares we turned our backs
And towards our distant rest began to trudge.

Men marched asleep. Many had lost their boots
But limped on, blood-shod. All went lame; all blind;
Drunk with fatigue; deaf even to the hoots
Of wailing pipes and tiptoe singing trout.

When the Leament pale compassion saw Him drooping in like death, and full of wounds and tears
Then said he, "America! This is my last gash
In the Un-National Monument Along the Canadian Border

At the Un-National Monument Along the Canadian Border (1977)

This is the field where the battle did not happen, where the unknown soldier did not die.
This is the field where grass joined hands,
where no monument stands,

William Stafford (1914-1993)

Erich Fried (1921-1988)

The Measures Taken (1977)

The lazy are slaughtered
the world grows industrious
The ugly are slaughtered
the world grows beautiful
The foolish are slaughtered
the world grows wise
The sick are slaughtered
the world grows healthy
The sad are slaughtered
the world grows merry
The old are slaughtered
the world grows young
The enemies are slaughtered the world grows friendly
The wicked are slaughtered the world grows good

--Translated from the German by Michael Hamburger

Questions

1. Can you relate this poem to a particular historical context? Explain.
2. Does it also have a more general application?
3. Do you think that the author shares the speaker's views? Why or why not?
4. What is especially ironic about the concluding couplet?
The Tone of the Poem

The tone of a poem conveys the speaker's attitude toward his or her audience. In speech, this attitude can be conveyed easily: stressing a word in a sentence can modify or color a statement, drastically affecting the meaning of a sentence. For example, the statement "Of course, you could want to go to that restaurant" is quite straightforward, but changing the emphasis to "Of course you would want to go to that restaurant" transforms a neutral statement into a sarcastic one. For poets, however, conveying a particular tone to readers represents a challenge because readers rarely hear their spoken voices. Instead, poets indicate tone by using techniques such as rhyme, meter, word choice, sentence structure, figures of speech, and imagery.

The range of possible tones is wide. For example, a poem's speaker may be serious, comic, intimate, formal, relaxed, detached, or ironic. The detached tone of the following poem conveys the speaker's attitude toward his or her subject.

Robert Frost
(1874–1963)

Fire and Ice
(1923)

Some say the world will end in fire,
Some say in ice.
From what I've tasted of desire
I hold with those who favor fire.

But if it had to perish twice,
I think I know enough of hate
To say that for destruction ice
Is also great
And would suffice.

The speaker uses word choice, rhyme, and understatement to comment on the human condition. The conciseness and the simple, regular meter and rhyme suggest an epigram—a short poem that makes a pointed comment in an unusually clear, and often witty, manner. This pointedness is consistent with the speaker's glib, unemotional tone, as is the last line's understatement that ice "would suffice." The contrast between the serious message—that active hatred and indifference are equally destruction—and its informal style and offhand tone is consistent with the speaker’s detached, almost smug, posture.

Sometimes shifts in tone reveal changes in the speaker’s attitude. In the following poem, changes in tone reveal a shift in the speaker’s attitude toward war.

THOMAS HARDY
(1840-1928)

The Man He Killed
(1902)

“Had he and I but met
By some old ancient inn,
We should have sat us down to wet
Right many a nipperkin!”

“But ranged as infantry,
And staring face to face,
I shot at him as he at me,
And killed him in his place.

“I shot him dead because—
Because he was my foe,
Just so: my foe of course he was;
That’s clear enough; although “He thought he’d enlist, perhaps,

Off-hand-like—just as I—
Was out of work—had sold his traps—
No other reason why.

“Yes; quaint and curious war is!
You shoot a fellow down
You’d treat if met where any bar is,
Or help to half-a crown.”

The speaker in this poem is a soldier relating his wartime experience. Quotation marks indicate that he is engaged in conversation—perhaps in a pub—and his dialect indicates that he is probably of the English working class. For him, at least at first, the object of war is simple: kill or be killed.

To Hardy, this speaker represents all men who are thrust into war, understanding its underlying economic or ideological causes. In his mind, the speaker and his enemy are both victims of forces beyond his comprehension or control.

The tone of “The Man He Killed” changes as the speaker tells his story. As the poem unfolds, its sentence structure deteriorates, and this in turn helps to convey the speaker’s changing attitude toward the war in which he is caught. In the first two stanzas of the poem, sentences are smooth and unbroken, establishing the speaker’s matter-of-fact tone and reflecting his confidence that he has done what he had to do. In the third and fourth stanzas, however, broken syntax reflects the narrator’s increasingly detached state of mind as he tells about the man he killed. The poem’s rhyme scheme and regular rhyme scheme (Met/wet, inn/nipperkin) suggest that the speaker is trying hard to maintain his composure; the smooth sentence structure of the last stanza and the use of a cliché in an attempt to neutralize the incident (“Yes; quaint and curious war is!”) show the speaker’s efforts to regain his control.

Sometimes a poem’s tone can establish an ironic contrast between the speaker and his or her subject. In the next poem, the speaker’s abrupt change of tone at the end of the poem establishes just such a contrast.

AMY LOWELL
(1874-1925)

Patterns
(1915)

I walk down the garden-paths,
And all the daffodils
Are blowing, and the bright blue squills.
I walk down the patterned garden-paths
In my stiff, brocaded gown.
With my powdered hair and jewelled fan,
I too am a rare
Pattern. As I wander down
The garden-paths.

My dress is richly figured,
And the train
Makes a pink and silver stain
On the gravel, and the thrill
Of the borders.

Just a plate of current fashion
Tripping by in high-heeled, ribboned shoes.

---

A small container of liquor.

Enlist.
Not a softness anywhere about me,
Only whalebone1 and brocade.
And I sink on a seat in the shade.

20 Of a lime tree, for my passion
Wars against the stiff brocade.
The daffodils and squills
Flutter in the breeze
As they please.

And I weep;
For the lime-tree is in blossom
And one small flower has dropped upon my bosom.
And the plastering of waterdrops
In the marble fountain.

30 Comes down the garden-paths.
The dripping never stops.
Underneath my stiffened gown
Is the softness of a woman bathing in a marble basin,
A basin in the midst of hedges grown.

So thick, she cannot see her lover hiding,
But she guesses he is near,
And the sliding of the water
Seems the stroking of a dear
Hand upon her.

40 What is Summer in a fine brocaded gown!
I should like to see it lying in a heap upon the ground.
All the pink and silver crumpled up on the ground.
I would be the pink and silver as I ran along the paths,
And he would stumble after,

Bewildered by my laughter.
I should see the sun flaming from his sword-hilt and buckles
- on his shoes.
I would choose
To lead him in a maze along the patterned paths,
A bright and laughing maze for my heavy-booted lover.

50 Till he caught me in the shade,
And the buttons of his waistcoat bruised my body as he clasped me
Aching, melting, unafraid.
With the shadows of the leaves and the sundrops,
And the plopping of the waterdrops.

All about us in the open afternoon—
I am very likely swoon
With the weight of this brocade,
For the sun sifts through the shade.

End of the fallen blossom

1 Used in making corsets.
Gorgeously arrayed,
Boned and stayed.
And the softness of my body will be guarded from embrace
By each button, hook, and lace.
For the man who should loose me is dead,
Fighting with the Duke in Flanders,³
In a pattern called a war.
Christ! What are patterns for?

The speaker begins by describing herself walking down garden paths, wearing a stiff brocaded gown, has powdered hair, and carries a jeweled bag. By her own admission she is “a plate of current fashion.” Although her tone is controlled, she is preoccupied by sensual thoughts. Beneath the “stiffened gown” is the “softness of a woman bathing in a marble bath” and the “sliding of the water” in a fountain. The speaker imagines herself shedding her brocaded gown and running with her lover along the maze of “patterned paths.”

The sexuality of the speaker’s thoughts stands in ironic contrast to the images of stiffness and control that dominate the poem: her passion is against the stiff brocade.” She is also full of repressed rage. After she knows that her lover has been killed, and she realizes the meaninglessness of the patterns of her life, patterns to which she has conformed, just as her lover has conformed by going to war and doing what he was supposed to do. Throughout the poem, the speaker’s tone reflects her barely contained anger and frustration. In the last line of the poem, when she lets out her rage, the poem’s point about the senselessness of war becomes apparent.

Poems for Further Reading: The Tone of the Poem

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH
(1770-1850)

The World Is Too Much with Us
(1807)

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon:

³Region in northwestern Europe, including part of northern France and western Belgium. Flanders was the site of a historic World War I battle.
SYLVIA PLATH
(1932-1963)

Morning Song
(1962)

Love set you going like a fat gold watch.
The midwife slapped your footsoles, and your bald cry
Took its place among the elements.

Our voices echo, magnifying your arrival. New statue.

In a drafty museum, your nakedness
Shadows our safety. We stand round blankly as walls.

I'm no more your mother
Than the cloud that distills a mirror to reflect its own slow Effacement at the wind's hand.

All night your moth-breath
Flickers among the flat pink roses. I wake to listen:
A far sea moves in my ear.

One cry, and I stumble from bed, cow-heavy and floral
In my Victorian nightgown.

Your mouth opens clean as a cat's. The window square Whitens and swallows its dull stars. And now you try
Your handful of notes;
The clear vowels rise like balloons.

READING AND REACTING

1. Who is the speaker? To whom is she speaking? What does the poem reveal about her?

2. What is the poem's subject? What attitudes about her subject does the poet expect her readers to have?

3. How is the tone of the first stanza different from that of the second stanza? How does the tone reflect the content of each stanza?

4. In what sense does this poem reinforce traditional ideas about motherhood? How does it undercut them?

5. Sylvia Plath’s life, which ended with her suicide, was marked by emotional turbulence and instability. According to Anne Stevenson in Bitter Fame, her 1988 biography of Plath, in the weeks immediately preceding the composition of "Morning Song" a fit of rage over her husband’s supposed infidelity caused Plath to destroy many of his books and papers. How would you characterize the speaker? Do you think he expects his listeners to share his views? How might his expectations affect the tone?
2. This poem is developed almost like an argument. What is the speaker's main point? How does he support it?
3. What effect does the poem's use of rhyme have on its tone?
4. Journal Entry: Whose side are you on—the speaker's or that he addresses?

Related Works: "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" (1895), "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (p. 536), "Cinderella" (p. 615), "Brute" (p. 1040)

Irony

Irony in poetry occurs when a disparity exists between two levels of meaning or experience. Consider the following lines by Stephen Crane:

Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind.
Because your lover threw wild hands toward the sky
And the a frighted steed ran on alone,
Do not weep.
War is kind.

How can war be "kind"? Isn't war exactly the opposite of "kind"? In an ironic statement, the speaker actually conveys the opposite idea of cruel, mindless exercise of violence.

Skillfully used, irony is a powerful way of making a pointed comment about a situation or of manipulating a reader's emotions. Implicitly, it is the writer's assumption that readers will not be misled by the literal meaning of a statement. In order for irony to work, readers must recognize the disparity between what is said and what is meant, or between what a character or speaker thinks is occurring and what readers know is occurring.

One kind of irony that appears in poetry is dramatic irony. It occurs when a speaker believes one thing and readers realize something else. In the following poem, the poet uses a deranged speaker to tell a story that is filled with irony.

Porphyria's Lover

(1836)

The rain set early in to-night,
The sullen wind was soon
Murmuring, Be sure I looked up at her eyes
When gilded in Porphyria; straight
She shut the cold out and the storm,
And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
Blaze up, and all the cottage warm;
Which done, she rose, and from her form
Withdrawed the dripping cloak and shawl,
And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
And, last, she sat down by my side
And called me. When no voice replied,
She put my arm about her waist,
And made her smooth white shoulder bare,
And all her yellow hair displaced,
And, stooping, made my cheek lie there,
And spread, o'er all, her yellow hair,
Murmuring how she loved me—she Too weak, for all her heart's endeavour,
To set its struggling passion free
From pride, and vainer ties dissover,
And give herself to me for ever.

But passion sometimes would prevail,
Nor could to-night's gay feast restrain
A sudden thought of one so pale
For love of her, and all in vain:
So, she was come through wind and rain.
Be sure I looked up at her eyes
Happy and proud; at last I knew
Porphyria worshipped me, surprise
Made my heart swell, and still it grew
While I debated what to do.
That moment she was mire, mine, fair,
Perfectly pure and good: I found
A thing to do, and all her hair
In one long yellow string I wound

Related Works: "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" (1895), "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (p. 536), "Cinderella" (p. 615), "Brute" (p. 1040)
I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed;
And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:"
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

The speaker tells a tale about a colossal statue that lies shattered in the desert. In the pedestal of the monument are words exhorting all those who pass: "Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!" The situational irony of the poem has its source in the contrast between the "colossal wreck" and the boastful inscription on its base. To the speaker, Ozymandias stands for the vanity of those who mistakenly think they can withstand the ravages of time.

Perhaps the most common kind of irony found in poetry is verbal irony, which is created when words say one thing but mean another, or exactly the opposite. When verbal irony is particularly biting, it is called sarcasm—for example, Stephen Crane's use of the word kind in his poem "War Is Kind." In speech, verbal irony is easy to detect through the speaker's change in tone or emphasis. In writing, when these words are absent, verbal irony becomes more difficult to convey. Poets can depend on the context of a remark or on the contrast between a word and another image in the poem to create irony.

Consider how verbal irony is established in the following poem.
ARIEL DORFMAN
(1942— )

Hope
(1988)

Translated by Edith Grossman with the author

My son has been missing since May 8 of last year.

They took him just for a few hours they said just for some routine questioning.

After the car left, the car with no license plate, we couldn't find out anything else about him.

But now things have changed. We heard from a compañero who just got out that five months later they were torturing him in Villa Grimaldi, at the end of September they were questioning him in the red house that belonged to the Grimaldis.

They say they recognized his voice his screams they say. Somebogy tell me frankly what times are these what kind of world what country? What I'm asking is how can it be that a father's joy a mother's joy is knowing that they that they are still torturing their son? Which means that he was alive five months later and our greatest hope will be to find out next year that they're still torturing him eight months later and he may might could still be alive.

Although it is not necessary to know the background of the poet to appreciate this poem, it does help to know that Ariel Dorfman is a native of Chile. After the assassination of Salvador Allende, Chile's elected socialist president in September 1973, the civilian government was replaced by a ruthless dictatorship. Civil rights were suspended, and activists, students, members of opposition parties were arrested and often detained indefinitely. Sometimes they simply disappeared. The irony of this poem originates in the discrepancy between the way the word hope is used in the poem and the way it is usually used. For most people, hope has positive connotations, but in this poem it takes on a different meaning. This irony is focused on the speaker.

35 that a father's joy
40 a mother's joy is knowing
45 that they that they are still torturing their son? Which means 50 that he was alive five months later and our greatest hope will be to find out next year that they're still torturing him eight months later and he may might could still be alive.
Poems for Further Reading: Irony

W. H. AUDEN
(1907–1973)

The Unknown Citizen
(1939)

(To Is/07/M/378
This Marble Monument Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint.
5
For in everything he did he served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired
He worked in a factory and never got fired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn’t a scab or odd in his views,
10
For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found
That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day.
15
And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.
Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
And his Health-card shows he was once in hospital but left it cured.
Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Installment Plan.
And had everything necessary to the Modern Man,
A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.
Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace; when there was war, he went.
20
He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his generation.
And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

Reading and Reacting

The "unknown citizen" represents modern citizens, who, according to the poem, are programmed like machines. How does the title help to establish the tone of the poem? How does the inscription on the monument help to establish the tone?
Who is the speaker? What is his attitude toward the unknown citizen? How can you tell?
What kinds of irony are present in the poem? Identify several elements.
Journal Entry This poem was written in 1939. Does its criticism apply to contemporary society, or does the poem seem dated?
Critical Perspective In 1939, the same year this poem was published, Auden argued in his essay "The Public vs. The Late Mr.
William Butler Yeats" that poetry can never really change anything. He reiterated this point as late as 1971 in his biographical A Certain World:

By all means let a poet, if he wants to, write poems...[that protest] against this or that political evil or social injustice.
But let him remember this. The only person who will benefit from them is himself; they will enhance his literary reputation among those who feel as he does. The evil or injustice, however, will remain exactly what it would have been if he had kept his mouth shut.

Do you believe that poetry—or any kind of literature—has the erpower to combat "evil or injustice" in the world? Do you consider The Unknown Citizen a political poem? How might this poem affect positive social or political change?

Related Works: "A&P" (p. 97), "The Metamorphosis" (p. 388), "The Man Killed" (p. 590), "next to of course god america I" (p. 785), A Doll House (p. 970)

Anne Sexton
(1928–1974)

Cinderella
(1970)

You always read about it:
the plumber with twelve children who wins the Irish Sweepstakes.
From toilets to riches.
That story.

One who studies the science of human improvement, especially through genetic control.
All but Cinderella were preparing and gussying up for the big event.
Cinderella begged to go too.
Her stepmother threw a dish of lentils into the cinders and said: Pick them up in an hour and you shall go.
The white dove brought all his friends;
all the warm wings of the fathertop came,
and picked up the lentils in a jiffy.
No, Cinderella, said the stepmother,
you have no clothes and cannot dance.
That's the way with stepmothers.
Cinderella went to the tree at the grave and cried forth like a gospel singer:
Mama! Mama! My turtle dove, send me to the prince's ball!
The bird dropped down a golden dress and delicate little gold slippers.
Rather a large package for a simple bird.
So she went. Which is no surprise.
Her stepmother and sisters didn't recognize her without her cinder face and the prince took her hand on the spot and danced with no other the whole day.
As nightfall came she thought she'd better get home. The prince walked her home and she disappeared into the pigeon house and although the prince took an axe and broke it open she was gone. Back to her cinders.
These events repeated themselves for three days.
However on the third day the prince covered the palace steps with cobbler's wax and Cinderella's gold shoe stuck upon it.
Now he would find whom the shoe fit and find his strange dancing girl for keeps.
He went to their house and the two sisters were delighted because they had lovely feet.
The eldest went into a room to try the slipper on but her big toe got in the way so she simply sliced it off and put on the slipper.
The prince rode away with her until the white dove told him to look at the blood pouring forth.
That is the way with amputations.
They don't just heal up like a wish.
The other sister cut off her heel.

1 Fashion designer Christian Dior.
2 Exclusive department store.
3 Al Jolson (Asa Yoelson; 1886-1950)—American singer and songwriter, famous for "black face" minstrel performances.
but the blood told as blood will.

90 The prince was getting tired.
He began to feel like a shoe salesman.
But he gave it one last try.
This time Cinderella fit into the shoe like a love letter into its envelope.

95 At the wedding ceremony the two sisters came to curry favor and the white dove pecked their eyes out.
Two hollow spots were left like soup spoons.

100 Cinderella and the prince lived, they say, happily ever after, like two dolls in a museum case never bothered by diapers or dust, ever arguing over the timing of an egg,
ever telling the same story twice, ever getting a middle-aged spread,
their darling smiles pasted on for eternity
Regular Bobbsey Twins.*
That story.

Reading and Reacting

1. The first twenty-one lines of the poem act as a prelude. How does this prelude help to establish the speaker's ironic tone?
2. At times the speaker talks directly to readers. What effect do these statements have on you? Would the poem be stronger without them?
3. Throughout the poem, the speaker mixes contemporary colloquial expressions with the conventional diction of a fairy tale. Find examples of these two kinds of language. How does the juxtaposition of these different kinds of diction create irony?
4. Journal Entry What details of the fairy tale does Sexton change in her poem? Why do you think she makes these changes?
5. Critical Perspective In his 1973 book Confessional Poets, Robert Phillips comments on Anne Sexton's use of the Grimm Brothers' fairy tales in her book Transformations. According to Phillips, by transforming the Grimms' stories into symbols of our own time, Sexton "has managed to offer us understandable images of the world around us":

* The two sets of twins—Nan and Bert, Flossie and Freddle—in a popular series of early twentieth-century children's books. They led an idealized, problem-free life.
SOUND AS MEANING

Isak Dinesen, in a memoir of her life on a plantation in East Africa, tells how some Kikuyu tribesmen reacted to their first hearing of rhyming verse:

The Natives, who have a strong sense of rhythm, know nothing of verse, or at least did not know anything before the times of the schools, where they were taught hymns. One evening out in the maize-field, where we had been harvesting maize, breaking off the cobs and throwing them on to the ox-carts, to amuse myself, I spoke to the field laborers, who were mostly quite young, in Swahili verse. There was no sense in the verses, they were made for the sake of rhyme—“Nkumbi na-penda chumbe, Malaya mbaya. Wakamba na-kula mamba.” The oxen like salt—whores are bad—The Wakamba eat snakes. It caught the interest of the boys, they formed a ring round me. They were quick to understand that meaning in poetry is of no consequence, and they did not question the thesis of the verse, but waited eagerly for the time, and laughed at it when it came. I tried to make them themselves find the rhyme and finish the poem when I had begun it, but they could not, or would not, do that, and turned away their heads. As they had become used to the idea of poetry, they begged: “Speak again. Speak like rain.” Why they should feel verse to be like rain I do not know. It must have been, however, an expression of applause, since in Africa rain is always longed for and welcomed.1

What the tribesmen had discovered is that poetry, like music, appeals to the ear. However limited it may be in comparison with the sound of an orchestra—or a tribal drummer—the sound of words in itself gives pleasure. However, we might doubt Isak Dinesen’s assumption that “meaning in poetry is of no consequence.” “Hey nonny-nonny” and such nonsense has a place in song lyrics and other poems, and we might take pleasure in hearing rhymes in Swahili; but most good poetry has meaningful sound as well as musical sound. Certainly the words of a song have an effect different from that of wordless music: they go along with their music and, by making statements, add more meaning. The French poet Isidore Isou, founder of a literary movement called Lettrisme, maintained that poems can be written not only in words but also in letters (sample lines: xyl, yl, / prpral dry / snlo trysy no). But the sound of letters alone, without denotation and connotation, has not been enough to make Letterist poems memorable. In the response of the Kikuyu tribesmen, there may have been not only the pleasure of hearing sounds but also the agreeable surprise of finding that things not usually associated had been brought together.

Euphony and Cacophony

More powerful when in the company of meaning, not apart from it, the sounds of consonants and vowels can contribute greatly to a poem’s effect. The sound of s, which can suggest the swishing of water, has rarely been used more accurately than in Surrey’s line “Calm is the sea, the waves work less and less.” When, in a poem, the sound of words working together with meaning pleases mind and ear, the effect is euphony, as in the following lines from Tennyson’s “Down, O maid”:

Myriads of rivulets hurrying through the lawn,
The moan of doves in immortal elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees.

Its opposite is cacophony: a harsh, discordant effect. It too is chosen for the sake of meaning. We hear it in Milton’s scornful reference in “Lycidas” to corrupt clergymen whose songs “Grate on their scarrn pipes of wretched straw.” (Read that line and one of Tennyson’s aloud and see which requires lips, teeth, and tongue to do more work.) But note that although Milton’s line is harsh in sound, the line (when we meet it in his poem) is pleasing because it is awful. In a famous passage from his Essay on Criticism, Pope has illustrated both euphony and cacophony. (Given here as Pope printed it, the passage relies heavily on italics and capital letters, for particular emphasis. If you will read these lines aloud, dwelling a little longer or harder on the words italicized, you will find that Pope has given you very good directions for a meaningful reading.)

Alexander Pope (1688-1744)

True Ease in Writing comes from Art, not Chance

True Ease in Writing comes from Art, not Chance,
As those move easiest who have learned to dance.
’Tis not enough no Harshness gives Offence,
The Sound must seem an Echo to the Sense.
Soft is the Strain when Zephyr gently blows,
And the smooth Stream in smoother Numbers flows;
But when loud Surges in the Rolling Shore,
The hoarse, rough Verse should like the Torment roar.
When Alas strives, some Rockia vast Weight to throw,
Now burns with Glory, and then melts with Love;
Now his fierce Eyes
Flies o'er rh' unbending
And bid
Now Ict-e:
While, at each Change, the Son of Lybian Jove
Persians and Greeks like
And what Timotheus was, is Prior woman of Music," John

could have sped across an ocean's surge could have skimmed across an unmown grainfield sage from

and the stream,

words that convey nothing meaning entirely different in "The murdering of innumerable beeves." While it is cellar door. Another wit once nominated, as our Zoom, whiz, crash, bang, ding-dong, most beautiful phrase in the English language, according to Dorothy Parker, is the notes of bells, the sounds of musical instruments, the noises of wind, sea, and rain, the rattle of milkcarts, the clapping of hooves on cobbles, the fingerling of branches on the window pane, might be to someone, deaf from birth, who has miraculously found his hearing. For readers, too, the sound of words can have a magical spell, most powerful when it points to meaning. James Weldon Johnson in God's Trombones has told of an old-time preacher who began his sermon, "Brothers and sisters, this morning I intand to explain the unexplainable—find out the indefinable—ponder over the imponderable—and unscrew the inscrutable!" The repetition of sound in unscrew and inscrutable has appeal, but the magic of the words is all the greater if they lead us to imagine the mystery of all things, the sound of the word or the meaning of a word may have value all by itself, both become more memorable when taken together.

William Butler Yeats (1865-1939)

Who Goes with Fergus?

Who will go drive with Fergus now,
And pierce the deep wood's woven shade,
And dance upon the level shore;
Young man, lift up your russet brow,
And lift your tender eyelids, maid,
And brood on hopes and fear no more.

And no more turn aside and brood
Upon love's bitter mystery;
For Fergus rules the brazen cars,
And rules the shadows of the wood,
And the white breast of the dim sea
And all dishevelled wandering stars.

Who Goes with Fergus? Fergus: Irish king who gave up his throne to be a wandering poet.

Questions
1. In what lines do you find euphony?
2. In what line do you find cacopha
3. How do the sounds of these lines stress what is said in them?

Exercise: Listening to Meaning
Read aloud the following brief poems. In the sounds of which particular words are meanings well captured? In which of the following four poems do you find onomatopoeia?

Onomatopoeia
Relating sound more closely to meaning, the device called onomatopoeia is an attempt to represent a thing or action by a word that imitates the sound associated with it: zoom, whiz, crash, bang, ding-dong, pitter-patter, yakety-yak. Onomatopoeia is often effective in poetry, as in Emily Dickinson's line about the fly with its "uncertain stumbling Buzz," in which the nasal sounds n, m, ng and the sibilants s, s help make a droning buzz.

Like the Kikuyu tribesmen, others who care for poetry have discovered in the

ALLITERATION AND ASSONANCE

Listening to a symphony in which themes are repeated throughout each movement, we enjoy both their recurrence and their variation. We take similar pleasure in the repetition of a phrase or a single chord. Something like this pleasure is afforded us frequently in poetry.

Analogies between poetry and wordless music, it is true, tend to break down when carried far, since poetry—to mention a single difference—has denotation. But like musical compositions, poems have patterns of sounds. Among such patterns long popular in English poetry is alliteration, which has been defined as a succession of similar sounds. Alliteration occurs in the repetition of the same consonant sound at the beginning of successive words—"round and round the rugged rocks the ragged rascal ran," or in this delightful stanza by Witter Bynner, written nearly a century ago as part of an elaborate literary hoax:

If I were only daster
I might be making hymns
To the liquor of your laughter
And the lacquer of your limbs.

Or it may occur inside the words, as in Milton's description of the gates of Hell:

On a sudden open fly
With impetuous recoil and jarring sound
The infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shocks
Of Erebus.

The former kind is called initial alliteration, the latter internal alliteration or hidden alliteration. We recognize alliteration by sound, not by spelling: know and nail alliterate, know and key do not. In a line by E. E. Cummings, "colossal hoax of clocks and calendars," the sound of x within hoax alliterates with the eks in clocks. Incidentally, the letter r does not always lend itself to cacophony: elsewhere in Paradise Lost Milton said that

Heaven opened wide
Her ever-during gates, harmonious sound
On golden hinges moving . . .

By itself, a letter-sound has no particular meaning. This is a truth forgotten by people who would attribute the effectiveness of Milton's lines on the Heavenly Gates to, say, "the mellow o's and liquid l of harmonious and golden." Mellow o's and liquid l's occur also in the phrase moldy cold oatmeal, which may have a quite different effect. Meaning depends on larger units of language than letters of the alphabet.

Poetry formerly contained more alliteration than it usually contains today. In Old English verse, each line was held together by alliteration, a basic pattern still evident in the fourteenth century, as in the following description of the world as a "fair field" in Piers Plowman:

A fair field ful of folk, and I ther bi-twene,

---
Most poets nowadays save alliteration for special occasions. They may use it to give emphasis, as Edward Lear does: "Far and few, far and few. / Are the lands where the jumbleys live." With its aid they can point out the relationship between two things placed side by side, as in Pope's line on things of little worth: "The courtier's promises, and sick man's prayers." Alliteration, too, can be a powerful aid to memory. It is hard to forget such tongue twisters as "Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers," or common expressions such as "green as grass," "tried and true," and "from stem to stern." In fact, because alliteration directs our attention to something, it had best be used neither thoughtlessly nor merely for decoration, lest it call attention to emptiness. A case in point may be a line by Philip James Bailey, a reaction to a lady's weeping: "I saw, but spared to speak." If the poet chose the word spared for any meaningful reason other than that it alliterates with speak, the reason is not clear.

As we have seen, to repeat the sound of a consonant is to produce alliteration, but to repeat the sound of a vowel is to produce assonance. Like alliteration, assonance may occur either initially—"all the awful auguries"—or internally—Edmund Spenser's "Her goodly eyes like sapphires shining bright, / Her forehead ivory white . . ." and it can help make common phrases unforgettable: "eager beaver," "holy smoke." Like alliteration, it slows the reader down and focuses attention.

A. E. Housman (1859–1936)

Eight O'Clock

He stood, and heard the steeple
Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, three, four, to market-place and people
It tossed them down.

Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour,
He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
Its strength, and struck.

Questions

1. Why does the protagonist in this brief drama curse his luck? What is his situation?
2. For so short a poem, "Eight O'Clock" carries a great weight of alliteration. What patterns of initial alliteration do you find? What patterns of internal alliteration? What effect is created by all this heavy emphasis?

James Joyce (1882–1941)

All day I hear

All day I hear the noise of waters
Making moan,
Sad as the sea-bird is, when going Forth alone.

The grey winds, the cold winds are blowing
Where I go.
I hear the noise of many waters
Far below.
All day, all night, I hear them flowing
To and fro.

Questions

1. Find three instances of alliteration in the first stanza. Do any of them serve to reinforce meaning?
2. There is a great deal of assonance throughout the poem on a single vowel sound. What sound is it, and what effect is achieved by its repetition?

Experiment: Reading for Assonance

Try reading aloud as rapidly as possible the following poem by Tennyson. From the difficulties you encounter, you may be able to sense the slowing effect of assonance. Then read the poem aloud a second time, with consideration.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892)

The splendor falls on castle walls

The splendor falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
O sweet and far from cliff and scard.
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river;
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow for ever and for ever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

RIME

Isak Dinesen's tribesmen, to whom time was a new phenomenon, recognized at once that timed language is special language. So do we, for, although much English poetry is untimed, rime is one means to set poetry apart from ordinary conversation and bring it closer to music. A rime (or rhyme), defined most narrowly, occurs when two and the consonant-sounds (if any) that follow the vowel-sound are identical: hay and sleigh, prairie schooner and piano tuner. From these examples it will be seen that rime depends not on spelling but on sound.

Excellent rimes surprise. It is all very well that a reader may anticipate which vowel-sound is coming next, for patterns of rime give pleasure by satisfying expectations; but riming becomes dull clunking if, at the end of each line, the reader can predict the word that will end the next. Hearing many a jukebox song for the first time, a listener can do so: charms lead to arms, skies above to love. As Alexander Pope observes of the habits of dull rimesters,

Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze;"
In the next line it "whispers through the trees";
If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep;"
The reader's threatened (not in vain) with "sleep" . . .

But who—given the opening line of this comic poem—could predict the lines that follow?

William Cole (1919–2000)

On my boat on Lake Cayuga 1985

On my boat on Lake Cayuga
I have a horn that goes "Ay-oogah!"
I'm not the modern kind of creep
Who has a horn that goes "beep beep."

Robert Herrick, in a more subtle poem, made good use of rime to indicate a startling contrast:

Then while time serves, and we are but decaying,
Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

Though good rimes seem fresh, not all will startle, and probably few will call to mind the very words a poet would need in order to say something new and original.

Types of Rime

To have an exact rime, sounds following the vowel sound have to be the same: red and bread, weakly and stealthily, walk to her and talk to her. If final consonant sounds are the same but the vowel sounds are different, the result is slant rime, also called near rime, off rime, or imperfect rime: sun riming with bone, moon, rain, green, gone, thin. By not satisfying the reader's expectation of an exact chime, but instead giving a clunk, a slant rime can help a poet say some things in a particular way. It works especially well for disappointed letdowns, negations, and denials, as in Blake's couplet:

He who the ox to wrath has moved
Shall never be by woman loved.

Many poets have admired the unexpected and arresting effects of slant rime. One of the first poets to explore the possibilities of rhyming consonants in a consistent way was Wilfred Owen, an English soldier in World War I, who wrote his best poems in the thirteen months before he was killed in action. Seeking a poetic language strong enough to describe the harsh reality of modern war, Owen experimented with matching consonant sounds in striking ways:

Now men will go content with what they find
Or, discontent, boil bloody, and be spilled,
They will be swift with swiftness of the tigress.
None will break ranks, though nations trek from progress.
Courage was mine, and I had mystery,
Wisdom was mine, and I had mastery.
To miss the march of this retreating world
Into vain citadels that are not walled.

Consonance, a kind of slant rime, occurs when the rimed words or phrases have the sound beginning and ending consonant sounds but a different vowel, as in chitter and chatter. Owen rimes spoiled and spilled in this way. Consonance is used in a traditional nonsense poem, "The Cutty Wren": "'O where are you going?' says Milder to Malder. (W. H. Auden wrote a variation on it that begins, "'O where are you going?' said reader to rider," thus keeping the consonance.)

End rime, as its name indicates, comes at the ends of lines, internal rime within them. Most rime tends to be end rime. Few recent poets have used internal rime so heavily as Wallace Stevens in the beginning of "Bantams in Pine-Woods": "'Chieflain Ifucan of Ascan in caiten / Of tan with henna hackles, half!' (lines also heavy on alliteration). A poet may employ both end rime and internal rime in the same poem, as in Robert Burns's satiric ballad "The Kirk's Alarm":

Orthodox, Orthodox, wha believe in John Knox,
Let me sound an alarm to your conscience:
There's a heretic blast has been blown i' the west,
"That what is not sense must be nonsense."

Masculine rime is a time of one-syllable words (red, bed) or (in words of more than Feminine rime is a rime of two or more syllables, with stress on a syllable other than the last: TUR-tle, FER-tle, or (to take an example from Byron) in-tel-LECT-u-al, hen-PECKED you all. Often it lends itself to comic verse, but can occasionally be valuable to serious poems, as in Wordsworth's "Resolution and Independence":

We poets in our youth begin in gladness,
But thereof come in the end despondency and madness, or as in Anne Sexton's seriously witty "Eighteen Days Without You":

and of course we're not married, we are a pair of scissors who come together to cut, without towels saying His. Hers.

Artfully used, feminine rime can give a poem a heightened musical effect for the simple reason that it offers the listener twice as many rimesyllables in each line. In the wrong hands, however, that sonic abundance has the unfortunate ability of making a bad poem twice as painful to endure. Serious poems containing feminine rimes of three syllables have been attempted, notably by Thomas Hood in "The Bridge of Sighs":

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care;
Fashioned so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!

But the pattern is hard to sustain without lapsing into unintended comedy, as in the same poem:

Still, for all slips of hers,
One of Eve's family—
Wipe those poor lips of hers,
Oozing so clammy.

It works better when comedy is wanted.

Hilaire Belloc (1870-1953)

The Hippopotamus

I shoot the Hippopotamus with bullets made of platinum,
Because if I use leaden ones his hide is sure to flatten 'em.

Ogden Nash (1902-1971)

The Panther

The panther is like a leopard,
Except it hasn't been peppered.
Should you behold a panther crouch,
Prepare to say Ouch.
Better yet, if called by a panther.

---

In eye rime, spellings look alike but pronunciations differ—rough and dough, idea and flea, Venus and menus. Strictly speaking, eye time is not rime at all.

Rime in American poetry suffered a significant fall from favor in the early 1960s.
A new generation of poets took for models the open forms of Whitman, Pound, and William Carlos Williams. In the last few decades, however, some poets have been skillfully using rime again in their work. Often called the New Formalists, these poets include Julia Alvarez, R. S. Gwynn, Mark Jarman, Paul Lake, Charles Martin, Marilyn Nelson, A. E. Stallings, and Timothy Steele. Their poems often use rime and meter to present unusual contemporary subjects, but they also sometimes write poems that recollect, converse with, and argue with the poetry of the past.

Still, most American poets don't write in rime; some even consider its possibilities exhausted. Such a view may be a reaction against the wearing thin of rimes by overuse or the mechanical and meaningless application of a rime scheme. Yet anyone who listens to children skipping rope in the street, making up rimes to delight themselves as they go along, may doubt that the pleasures of rime are ended; and certainly the practice of Yeats and Emily Dickinson, to name only two, suggests that the possibilities of slant rime may be nearly infinite. If successfully employed, as it has been at times by a majority of English-speaking poets whose work we care to save, rime runs through its poem like a spine: the creature moves by means of it.

---

William Butler Yeats (1865-1939)

Leda and the Swan (1896)

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill,
He holds her helpless breast upon his breast.

How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
And how can body, laid in that white rush,
But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?

A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?

Questions

1. According to Greek mythology, the god Zeus in the form of a swan descended on Leda, a Spartan queen. Among Leda's children were Clytemnestra, Agamemnon's unhappy wife, who conspired in his murder, and Helen, on whose account the Trojan war was fought. What does a knowledge of these allusions contribute to our understanding of the poem's last two lines?

2. The slant rime up / drop (lines 11, 14) may seem accidental or inept. Is it? Would this poem have ended nearly so well if Yeats had made an exact rhyme like up / cap or sup?
Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889)

God’s Grandeur

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
   It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
   It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
Crushed. Why do men then now not reek his rod?
Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
   And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
And wears man’s smudge and shares man’s smell: the soil
Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
And for all this, nature is never spent;
   There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
And though the last lights off the black West went
   Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

Questions
1. In a letter Hopkins explained shook foil (line 2): “I mean foil in its sense of leaf or tinsel . . . . Shaken goldfoil gives off broad glares like sheet lightning and also, and this is true of nothing else, owing to its zigzag dints and creasings and network of small many cornered facets, a sort of fork lightning too.” What do you think he meant by the phrase ooze of oil (line 3)? Would you call this phrase an example of alliteration?
2. What instances of internal rime does the poem contain? How would you describe their effects?
3. Point out some of the poet’s uses of alliteration and assonance. Do you believe that Hopkins perhaps goes too far in his heavy use of devices of sound, or would you defend his practice?
4. Why do you suppose Hopkins, in the last two lines, says over the bent / World instead of (as we might expect) bent over the world? How can the world be bent? Can you make any sense out of this wording, or is Hopkins just trying to get his rime scheme to work out?

William Jay Smith (b. 1918)

A Note on the Vanity Dresser

The yes-man in the mirror now says no,
No longer will I answer you with lies.
The lady descends like snow, so when the snow—
RHYTHM

I would define, in brief, the Poetry of words as the Rhythmical Creation of Beauty.

—EDGAR ALLAN POE

STRESSES AND PAUSES

Rhythms affect us powerfully. We are lulled by a hammock's sway, awakened by an alarm clock's repeated yammer. Long after we come home from a beach, the rising and falling of waves and tides continue in memory. How powerfully the rhythms of poetry also move us may be felt in folk songs of railroad workers and chain gangs whose words were chanted in time to the lifting and dropping of a sledgehammer, and in verse that marching soldiers shout, putting a stress on every word that coincides with a footfall:

Your LEFT! TWO! THREE! FOUR!
Your LEFT! TWO! THREE! FOUR!
You LEFT your WIFE and TWEN-ty-one KIDS
And you LEFT! TWO! THREE! FOUR!
You'll NEV-er get HOME to-NIGHT!

A rhythm is produced by a series of recurrences: the returns and departures of the seasons, the repetitions of an engine's stroke, the beats of the heart. A rhythm may be produced by the recurrence of a sound (the throb of a drum, a telephone's busy signal), but rhythm and sound are not identical. A totally deaf person at a parade can sense rhythm from the motions of the marchers' arms and feet, from the shaking of the pavement as they tramp. Rhythms inhere in the motions of the moon and stars, even though when they move, we hear no sound.

In poetry, several kinds of recurrent sound are possible, including (as we saw in the last chapter) rhyme, alliteration, and assonance. But most often when we speak of the rhythm of a poem, we mean the recurrence of stresses and pauses in it. When we hear a poem read aloud, stresses and pauses are, of course, part of its sound. It is possible to be aware of rhythms in poems read silently, too.

Stresses

A stress (or accent) is a greater amount of force given to one syllable in speaking than is given to another. We favor a stressed syllable with a little more breath and Stresses and pauses can be an effect not of power and force but of hesitation and uncertainty. Yeats asks: "Get WITH it!" "You're not THE Dolly Parton?" One word by itself is seldom long enough for us to notice a rhythm in it. Usually a sequence of at least a few words is needed for stresses to establish their pattern: a line, a passage, a whole poem. Strong rhythms may be seen in most Mother Goose rhymes, to which children have been responding for hundreds of years. This line is for an adult to chant while joggling a child up and down on a knee:

Here goes my lord
A trot, a trot, a trot, a trot!
Here goes my lady
A canter, a canter, a canter, a canter!
Here goes my young master
Jockey-hitch, jockey-hitch, jockey-hitch, jockey-hitch!
Here goes my young miss
An amble, an amble, an amble, an amble!
The footman lags behind to tipple ale and wine
And goes gallop, a gallop, a gallop, to make up his time.

More than one rhythm occurs in these lines, as the make-believe horse changes pace. How do these rhythms differ? From one line to the next, the interval between stresses lengthens or grows shorter. In "A TROT A TROT A TROT A TROT," the stress falls on every other syllable. But in the middle of the line "A CAN-ter a CAN-ter a CAN-ter a CAN-ter," the stress falls on every third syllable. When stresses recur at fixed intervals as in these lines, the result is called a meter.

"Canter a Canter," the stress falls on every third syllable. When stresses recur at every other syllable. But in the middle of the line...
4. Of all the lives I cannot live,
    I have elected one to haunt me till the margins give and I am left alone

One life has sounded in my voice and made me like a stone—

one that the falling leaves can sink not over, but upon.

- Annie Finch, "Dickinson"

5. The master, the swabbet, the bouswain, and I,
The gunner and his mate
Loved All, Meg, and Marian, and Margery,
But none of us cared for Kate;
For she had a tongue with a tang
Would cry to a sailor "Go hang!"
She loved not the savour of tar nor pitch
Yet a tailor might scratch her where'er she did itch;
Then to sea, boys, and let her go hang!

- William Shakespeare, a song from The Tempest

Pauses

Rhythms in poetry are due not only to stresses but also to pauses. "Every nice ear," observed Alexander Pope (nice meaning "finely tuned"), "must, I believe, have observed that in any smooth English verse of ten syllables, there is naturally a pause either at the fourth, fifth, or sixth syllable." Such a light but definite pause within a line is called a cesura (or caesura), "a cutting." More liberally than Pope, we apply the name to any pause in a line of any length, after any word in the line. In studying a poem, we often indicate a cesura by double vertical lines (\|). Usually, a cesura will occur at a mark of punctuation, but there can be a cesura even if no punctuation is present. Sometimes you will find it at the end of a phrase or clause or, as in these lines by William Blake, after an internal time:

And priests in black gowns \| were walking their rounds
And binding with briars \| my joys and desires.

Lines of ten or twelve syllables (as Pope knew) tend to have just one cesura, though sometimes there are more as in John Webster's line from The Duchess of Malfi:

Cover her face: \| mine eyes dazzle: \| she died young.

Pauses also tend to recur at more prominent places—namely, after each line. At the end of a verse (from versus, "a turning"), the reader's eye, before turning to go on to the next line, makes a pause, however brief. If a line ends in a full pause—usually indicated by some mark of punctuation—we call it end-stopped. All the lines in this passage from Christopher Marlowe's Doctor Faustus (in which Faustus addresses the apparition of Helen of Troy) are end-stopped:

Was this the face that launch'd a thousand ships,
    And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?

A line that does not end in punctuation and that therefore is read with only a slight pause after it is called a run-on line. Because a run-on line gives us only part of a phrase, clause, or sentence, we have to read on to the line or lines following, in order to complete a thought. All these lines from Robert Browning's "My Last Duchess" are run-on lines:

Sir, 'twas not

Her husband's presence only, called that spot
Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps
Fra Pandolfo chanced to say "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat." Such stuff
Was courtesy, she thought...

A passage in run-on lines has a rhythm different from that of a passage like Marlowe's in end-stopped lines. When emphatic pauses occur in the quotation from Browning, they fall within a line rather than at the end of one. The passage by Marlowe and that by Browning are in lines of the same meter (iambic) and the same length (ten syllables). What makes the big difference in their rhythms is the running on, or lack of it.

To sum up: rhythm is recurrence. In poems, it is made of stresses and pauses. The poet can produce it by doing any of several things: making the intervals between stresses fixed or varied, long or short; indicating pauses (cesuras) within lines; end-stopping lines or running them over; writing in short or long lines. Rhythm in itself cannot convey meaning. And yet if a poet's words have meaning, their rhythm must be one with it.

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917-2000)

We Real Cool

We Real Cool
The Pool Players.
Seven at the Golden Shovel.
We real cool. We Left school. We Lurk late. We Strike straight. We Sing sin. We Thin gin. We Jazz June. We Die soon.

Question
Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892)

Break, Break, Break (1834)

Break, break, break,
On thy cold gray stones, O Sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.
O well for the fisherman's boy,
That he shouts with his sister at play!
O well for the sailor lad,
That he sleeps in his boat on the bay!
And the stately ships go by
To their haven under the hill,
But O for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!
Break, break, break,
At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me.

Questions
1. Read the first line aloud. Why is it difficult to do so?
2. Which lines rely most heavily on stressed syllables?
3. How would you describe the rhythm of this poem? How is it appropriate to what is said?

Ben Jonson (1573–1637)

Slow, slow, fresh fount, keep time with my salt tears

Slow, slow, fresh fount, keep time with my salt tears;
Yet slower yet, oh faintly, gentle spring;
List to the heavy part the music bears,
Woe weeps out her division when she sings.
Drop herbs and flowers,
Fall grief in showers;
Our beauties are not ours;
Oh, I could still,
Like melting snow upon some craggy hill,
Drop, drop, drop, drop,
Since nature's pride is now a withered daffodil.

SLOW, SLOW, FRESH FOUNT. The myth of Echo sings this lament over the youth Narcissus in Jonson's play Cynthia's Revels. In mythology, Nemesis, goddess of vengeance, punished Narcissus for loving his own beauty, caused him to pine away and then transformed him into a narcissus (another name for a daffodil, line 11).

Dorothy Parker (1893–1967)

Résumé (1926)

Razor pain you;
Riven are damp;
Acids stain you;
And drugs cause cramp.
Guns aren't lawful;
Nooses give;
Gas smells awful;
You might as well live.

Questions
1. Which of the following words might be used to describe the rhythm of this poem, and which might not—flowing, jowzy, mournful, tender, abrupt?
2. Is this light verse or a serious poem? Can it be both?

METER

Meter is the rhythmic pattern of stresses in verse. To enjoy the rhythms of a poem, no special knowledge of meter is necessary. All you need to do is pay attention to stresses and where they fall, and you will perceive the basic pattern, if there is any. There is nothing occult about the study of meter. Most people find they can master its essentials in no more time than it takes to learn a complicated game such as chess. If you take the time, you will then have the pleasure of knowing what is happening in the rhythms of many a fine poem, and pleasurable knowledge may even deepen your insight into poetry. The following discussion, then, will be of interest only to those who care to go deeper into prosody, the study of metrical structures in poetry.

To make ourselves aware of a meter, we need only listen to a poem, or sound its words to ourselves. If we care to work out exactly what a poet is doing, we can scan a line or a poem by indicating the stresses in it. Scansion, the act of doing so, is not just a matter of pointing to syllables; it is also a matter of listening to a poem and making sense of it. To scan a poem is one way to indicate how to read it aloud; in order to see where stresses fall, you have to see the places where the poet wishes to put emphasis. That is why, when scanning a poem, you may find yourself suddenly understanding it.

An objection might be raised against scanning: isn't it too simple to pretend that all language (and poetry) can be divided neatly into stressed syllables and unstressed syllables? Indeed it is. Language isn't binary; there are many levels of stress from a scream to a whisper. However, the idea in scanning a poem is not to reproduce the sound of a human voice. For that we would do better to buy a tape recorder. To scan a poem, rather, is to make a diagram of the stresses (and absences of stress) we find in it. Various marks are used in scansion; in this book we use ' for a stressed syllable and

Questions
1. Read the first line aloud rapidly. Why is it difficult to do so?
2. Which lines rely most heavily on stressed syllables?
3. How would you describe the rhythm of this poem? How is it appropriate to what is said?
Types of Meter
There are four common accentual-syllabic meters in English—iambic, anapestic, trochaic, and dactylic. Each is named for its basic foot (usually a unit of two or three syllables that contains one strong stress) or building block. Here are some examples of each meter.

1. Iambic—a line made up primarily of iambs, an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable, "|". The iambic measure is the most common meter in English poetry. Many writers, such as Robert Frost, feel iambic meters most easily capture the natural rhythms of our speech.

   But soft, | what light | through | you | do win | dow breaks?
   —William Shakespeare

   When | I have | fear | that | I may | cease | to be
   —John Keats

   Had we | but world | enough | and time,
   This | coy | ness, | la | dy, | were | no crime
   —Andrew Marvell

   My life | had stood | | a load | ed
   —Emily Dickinson

2. Anapestic—a line made up primarily of anapests, two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed syllable, "-|". Anapestic meter resembles iambic but contains an extra unstressed syllable. Tocally anapestic lines often start to gallop, so poets sometimes slow them down by substituting an iambic foot (as Poe does in "Annabel Lee").

   The | As-syr | ian came down | like a wolf | on the fold
   And his | co | hots were gleam | ing | in | ple | gold.
   And the | sheen | of | their | spears | was | like | stars | on | the sea
   When the | blue | wave | rolls | night | ly | on | deep | Gal-i-lee
   —Lord Byron

   Now this | is the Law | of | the Jun | gle—| as old | and as true
   | as the sky;
   And the Wolf | that shall | keep | it | may | pros | pet, | but the Wolf
   | that shall | break | it | must | die.
   —Robert Louis Stevenson

3. Trochaic—a line made up primarily of trochees, a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed syllable, "-|". The trochaic meter is often associated with songs, chants, and magic spells in English. Trochees make a strong, emphatic meter that is often very mnemonic—that is, "helping, or meant to help, the memory." Shakespeare and Blake used trochaic meter to exploit its magical associations. Notice how Blake drops the unstressed syllable at the end of his lines from "The Tyger." (The location of a missing syllable in a metrical foot is usually marked with a caret sign, ^.)

   Doub-le, | double, | toil | and | trou-ble,
   Fi-re | burn | and | cauldron | bub-ble.
   —Shakespeare

   Ty-ger! | Ty-ger! | burning | bright
   In the | for-est | of | the | night
   —William Blake

   Go and | catch a | fall-ing | star
   —John Donne

4. Dactylic—a line made up primarily of dactyls, one stressed syllable followed by two unstressed syllables, "|-|". The dactylic meter is less common in English than in classical languages like Greek or Latin. Used carefully, dactylic meter can sound stately, as in Longfellow's "Evangelire.

   This is the | for-est | pri | me-| val.
   The | mur-mur-ing | pines and the | hem-lock
   —Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

But it also easily becomes a prancing, propulsive measure and is often used in comic verse.

   Puss-y-cat, | puss-y-cat, | where have you | been?
   —Mother Goose
Poets often drop the unstressed syllables at the end of a dactylic line, the omission usually being noted with a caret sign, "

Take her up | ten-der-ly,
\[ \] Lift with | care;
\[ \] Fash-ioned so | sen-der-ly,
Young, and so | fair! —Thomas Hood

Iambic and anapestic meters are called rising meters because their movement rises from an unstressed syllable (or syllables) to stress; trochaic and dactylic meters are called falling. In the twentieth century, the bouncing meters—anapestic and dactylic—were used more often for comic verse than for serious poetry. Called feet, though they contain no unaccented syllables, are the monosyllabic foot (') and the spondee ("'). Meters are not ordinarily made up of them; if one were, it would be like the steady impact of nails being hammered into a board—no pleasure to hear or to dance to. But inserted now and then, they can lend emphasis and variety to a meter, as Yeats well knew when he broke up the predominantly iambic rhythm of "Who Goes with Fergus?" (page 147) with the line in which two spondees occur.

\[ \] And the white breast of the dim sea.

Line Lengths

Meters are classified also by line lengths: trochaic monometer, for instance, is a line one trochee long, as in this anonymous brief comment on microbes:

Adam
Had 'em.

A frequently heard metrical description is iambic pentameter: a line of five iambics, a meter especially familiar because it occurs in all blank verse (such as Shakespeare's plays and Milton's Paradise Lost), heroic couplets, and sonnets. The commonly used names for line lengths follow:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Feet</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>monometer</td>
<td>one</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>dimer</td>
<td>two</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>trimeter</td>
<td>three</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>tetrameter</td>
<td>four</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>pentameter</td>
<td>five</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>hexameter</td>
<td>six</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>heptameter</td>
<td>seven</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>octameter</td>
<td>eight</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Lines of more than eight feet are possible but are rare. They tend to break up into shorter lengths in the listening ear.

When Yeats chose the monosyllabic white breast and dim sea, he was doing what expected one. Often such a substitution will be made at the very beginning of a line, as in the third line of this passage from Christopher Marlowe's Tragical History of Doctor Faustus:

Was this | the face | that launched | a thou | sand ships
And burst | the top | less tow'ns | of Il | i-um?
Sweet | Hel | en, make | me | im-mor | tal with | a kiss.

How, we might wonder, can that last line be called iambic at all? But it is, just as a waltz that includes an extra step or two, or leaves a few steps out, remains a waltz. In the preceding lines the basic iambic pentameter is established, and though in the third line the regularity is varied from, it does not altogether disappear. It continues for a while to run on in the reader's mind, where (if the poet does not stay away from it for too long) the meter will be when the poem comes back to it.

Like a basic dance step, a meter is not to be slavishly adhered to. The fun in reading a metrical poem often comes from watching the poet continually departing from perfect regularity, giving a few heel-kicks to display a bit of joy or ingenuity, then easing back into the basic step again. Because meter is orderly and the rhythms of living speech are unruly, poets can play one against the other, in a sort of counterpoint. Robert Frost, a master at pairing a line of iambics against a very natural-sounding and irregular sentence, declared, "I am never more pleased than when I can get these into strained relation. I like to drag and break the intonation across the meter as waves first comb and then break sprawling on the shingle.

Evidently Frost's skilled effects would be lost to a reader who, scanning a Frost poem or reading it aloud, distorted its rhythms to fit the words exactly to the meter. With rare exceptions, a good poem can be read and scanned the way we would speak its sentences if they were ours. This, for example, is an unreal scansion:

\[ \] That's my last Duchess paint-ed on the wall.

—because no speaker of English would say that sentence in that way. We are likely to stress That's and last.

Although in good poetry we seldom meet a very long passage of absolute metrical regularity, we sometimes find (in a line or so) a monotonous rhythm that is effective. Words fall meaningfully in Macbeth's famous statement of world-weariness: "Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow..." and in the opening lines of Thomas Gray's "Elegy":

\[ \] The curfew tolls the knell of part-ing day,
\[ \] The low-ing herd wind-slow-ly o'er the lea,
\[ \] The plow-man home-ward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to dark-ness and to me.

Although certain unstressed syllables in these lines seem to call for more emphasis than others—you might, for instance, care to throw a little more weight on the... second syllable of curfew in the opening line—we can still say that the lines are notably iambic. Their almost unvarying rhythm seems just right to convey the tolling of a bell and the weary setting down of one foot after the other.

Accentual Meter

Besides the two rising meters (iambic, anapestic) and the two falling meters (trochaic, dactylic), English poets have another valuable meter. It is accentual meter, in which the poet does not write in feet (as in the other meters) but instead counts accents (stresses). The idea is to have the same number of stresses in every line. The poet may place them anywhere in the line and may include practically any number of unstressed syllables, which do not count. In “Christabel,” for instance, Coleridge keeps four stresses to a line, though the first line has only eight syllables and the last line has eleven:

```
There is not wind enough to twirl
The one red leaf, the last of its clan,
That dances as often as dance it can,
Hang-ing so light, and hang-ing so high,
On the top-most twig that looks up at the sky.
```

The history of accentual meter is long and honorable. Old English poetry was written in a kind of accentual meter, but its line was more rule-bound than Coleridge’s: four stresses arranged two on either side of a cesura, plus alliteration of three of the stressed syllables. In “Junk,” Richard Wilbur revives the pattern:

```
An axe angles || from my neighbor’s ash-can . . .
```

Many poets, from the authors of Mother Goose rhymes to Gerard Manley Hopkins, have sometimes found accentual meters congenial. Recently, accentual meter has enjoyed huge popularity through rap poetry, which usually employs a four-stress line (see page 136 for further discussion of rap).

Although less popular among poets today than formerly, meter endures. Major poets from Shakespeare through Yeats have fashioned their work by it, and if we are to read their poems with full enjoyment, we need to be aware of it. To enjoy metrical poetry—even to write it—you do not have to slice lines into feet; you do need to recognize when a meter is present in a line, and when the line departs from it. An argument in favor of meter is that it reminds us of body rhythms such as breathing, walking, the beating of the heart. In an effective metrical poem, these rhythms cannot be separated from what the poet is saying—or, in the words of an old jazz song of Duke Ellington’s, “It don’t mean a thing if it ain’t got that swing.” As critic Paul Fussell has put it: “No element of a poem is more basic—and I mean physical—in its effect upon the reader than the metrical element, and perhaps no technical triumphs reveal more readily than the metrical the poet’s sympathy with that universal human nature . . . which exists outside his own.”

Exercise: Meaningful Variation

At what place or places in each of these passages does the poet depart from basic iambic meter? How does each departure help underscore the meaning?

1. Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he Who stands confirmed in utter stupidity.
   The rest to some faint meaning make pretense,
   But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
   —John Dryden, “Mac Flecknoe” (speech of Flecknoe, prince of Nonsense, referring to Thomas Shadwell, poet and playwright)

2. A needful Alexandrine ends the song
   That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
   —Alexander Pope, An Essay on Criticism

3. Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean—roll!
   Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
   Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
   Stops with the shore; upon the watery plain
   The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
   A shadow of man’s ravage, save his own,
   When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
   He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
   Without a grave, unknell’d, uncoffin’d, and unknown.
   —George Gordon, Lord Byron, Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage

4. Deer walk upon our mountains, and the quail
   Whistle about us in their spontaneous cries;
   Sweet berries ripen in the wilderness;
   And, in the isolation of the sky,
   At evening, casual flocks of pigeons make Ambiguous undulations as they sink.
   Downward to darkness, on extended wings.
   —Wallace Stevens, “Sunday Morning”

Exercise: Recognizing Rhythms

Which of the following poems contain predominant meters? Which poems are not wholly metrical, but are metrical in certain lines? Point out any such lines. What reasons do you see, in such places, for the poet’s seeking a metrical effect?

Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892-1950)

Counting-out Rhyme

Silver bark of beech, and sallow
Bark of yellow birch and yellow
Twig of willow.

Stripe of green in moosewood maple,
Color seen in leaf of apple,
Bark of people.

Wood of people pale as moonbeam,
Primary pleasure in poetry is . . . the pleasure of saying something over for its own sake and because it sounds just right. For myself . . . the thing may not necessarily be a great thought, though great thoughts are necessarily excluded either; it may be as near as not to meaningless, especially if one says it without much attention to its context. For instance, a silly song has the refrain: Sing ninety-nine and ninety. I can remember being charmed enough with that to say it over and over to myself for days, almost ever having a single thought about its meaning except for a certain amused wonder about how different it was from singing a hundred and ninety-nine.

Howard Nemerov, "Poetry and Meaning"

I have never taught a poetry writing class that has not suffered my iteration of Duke Ellington's line: "It don't mean a thing if it ain't got that swing." How can you describe the feeling of reading a Roethke poem, . . . when the rhythm is so palpable it is as if the poem could be cupped in your hands? How poems move great distances in meaning between sentences and yet hold together, largely because of the sound. The same thing is operating in a song that makes you want to get up and dance.

Michael Ryan, "On the Nature of Poetry"

The most obvious function of the line-break is rhythmic: it can record the slight (but meaningful) hesitations between word and word that are characteristic of the mind's dance among perceptions but which are not marked by grammatical punctuation. Regular punctuation is a part of regular sentence structure, that is, of the expression of completed thoughts; and this expression is typical of prose, even though prose is not at all times bound by logic. But in poems one has the opportunity not only, as in expressive prose, to depart from the syntactic norm, but . . . to present the dynamics of perception along with its arrival at full expression. The line-break is a form of punctuation additional to the punctuation that forms part of the logic of completed thoughts.

Denise Levertov, "On the Function of Line"
WALT WHITMAN
(1819-1892)

Had I the Choice

Had I the choice to tally greatest bards,
To limn their portraits, stately, beautiful, and emulate at will,
Homer with all his wars and warriors—Hector, Achilles, Ajax,
Or Shakespeare's woe-entangled Hamlet, Lear, Othello—Tennyson,
Or M. A. O. O. O. (Sadie and Maud)

Sadie a fair lady,
Sadie and Maud

Meter or wit the best, or choice conceit to wield in perfect rhyme
Of delight of singers;

These, these, O sea, all these I'd gladly barter,
Would you the undulation of one wave, its trick to me transfer,
Or breathe one breath of yours upon my verse,
And leave its odor there.

RHYTHM

Rhythm—the regular recurrence of sounds—is at the heart of all natural phenomena: the beating of a heart, the lapping of waves against the shore, the croaking of frogs on a summer's night, the whispering of whispering leaves rustling in the wind. In fact, even mechanical phenomena, such as the movement of rush-hour traffic through a city's streets, have a kind of rhythm. Poetry, which explores these phenomena, often tries to reflect these rhythms. Walt Whitman makes this point in "Had I the Choice" when he says that he would gladly trade the "perfect rhyme" of Shakespeare for the ability to reproduce "the undulation of one wave" in his verse.

Effective public speakers frequently repeat key words and phrases to create rhythm in his speech "I Have a Dream," for example, Martin Luther King, Jr., repeats the phrase "I have a dream" to create a cadence that ties the central section of the speech together:

I say to you today, my friends, even though we face the difficulties of today and tomorrow, I still have a dream. It is a dream deeply rooted

Sadie and Maud

Sadie and Maud

Maud went to college.
Sadie stayed at home.
Sadie scraped life
With a fine-tooth comb.

She didn't leave a tangle in
Her comb found every strand.
Sadie was one of the livingest chits
In all the land.

Sadie bore two babies
Under her maiden name.
Maud and Ma and Papa
Nearly died of shame.

When Sadie said her last so-long
Her girls struck out from home.
(Sadie had left as heritage
Her fine-tooth comb)

Maud, who went to college,
Is a thin brown mouse. She is living all alone
In this old house.

1 Publication date is not available.
2 To describe, depict.
Much of the force of this poem comes from its balanced structure and regular rhyme and meter, underscored by the repeated words “Sadie” and “Maud,” which shift the focus from one subject to the other and back again (“Maud went to college / Sadie stayed home”). The poem’s simple rhythm recalls the rhymes children recite when jumping rope. This version of carefree childhood ironically contrasts with the adult realities that both Sadie and Maud face as they grow up: Sadie stays at home and has two children out of wedlock; Maud goes to college and ends up with a brown mouse. The speaker implies that the alternatives Sadie and Maud represent are both undesirable. Although Sadie “scraped life / with her tooth comb,” she dies young and leaves nothing to her girl but her need to experience life. Maud, who graduated from college, slits out life’s roots.

Just as the repetition of words and phrases can create rhythm, so can the distribution of words among the lines of a poem—and even the appearance of words on a printed page. How a poem looks is especially important in open form poetry (see p. 732), which dispenses with traditional patterns of versification. In the following excerpt from a poem by E. E. Cummings, for example, an unusual arrangement of words forces the reader to slow down and then to speed up, creating a rhythm that emphasizes a key phrase—“The / lily”:

the moon is hiding
in her hair.
The lily of heaven
full of all dreams, draws down.

Poetic rhythm—the repetition of stresses and pauses—is an essential element in poetry. Rhythm helps to establish a poem’s mood, and in combination with other poetic elements, it conveys the poet’s emphasis and helps communicate the poem’s meaning. Although rhythm can be affected by the regular repetition of words and phrases or by the arrangement of words into lines, poetic rhythm is largely created by meter, the recurrence of regular units of stressed and unstressed syllables.

Meter

A stress (or accent) occurs when one syllable is emphasized more than another. Syllables are stressed weakly or strongly, or not at all. A weak stress is called unstressed syllable: for cups, bad, sick, and laid; strong stress is called stressed syllable: for flow, Ayes, Turned; in poetry, even one-syllable words can be stressed to create a particular effect. For example, in Elizabeth Barrett Browning’s line “How do I love thee? Let me count the ways,” the metrical pattern that places stress on “love” creates the meaning; stressing “I” would create another.

Scansion is the process of analyzing patterns of stressed and unstressed syllables within a line. The most common method of poetic notation involves indicating stressed syllables with ́ and unstressed syllables with ̀. Although scanning its lines gives readers the “beat” of the poem, it cannot accurately approximate the sound of spoken language, which contains a wide variety of stresses. By providing a graphic representation of the stressed and unstressed syllables of a poem, scansion aids understanding. It also substitutes for reading the poem aloud and experimenting with pronunciation patterns of emphasis.

The basic unit of meter is a foot—a group of syllables with a fixed pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables. The following chart illustrates the most common types of metrical feet in English and American verse.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Foot</th>
<th>Stress Pattern</th>
<th>Example</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Iamb</td>
<td>́o</td>
<td>They pace / in sleek</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trochee</td>
<td>́o</td>
<td>Thou, when</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anapest</td>
<td>́oo</td>
<td>With a hey,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dactyli</td>
<td>́oo</td>
<td>Constantly</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Stropic and anapestic meters are called rising meters because they progress from unstressed to stressed syllables. Trochaic and dactylic meters are called falling meters because they progress from stressed to unstressed syllables.

The following types of metrical feet, less common than those listed above, are used to emphasize or to provide variety rather than to create the dominant meter of a poem.
A metric line of poetry is measured by the number of feet it contains. The foot used and the number of feet the line contains. For example, the most common foot in English poetry is the iamb, most often occurring in lines of three or five feet.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Metric Type</th>
<th>Foot Description</th>
<th>Example Lines</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Monometer</td>
<td>One foot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dimeter</td>
<td>Two feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trimeter</td>
<td>Three feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tetrameter</td>
<td>Four feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pentameter</td>
<td>Five feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hexameter</td>
<td>Six feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heptameter</td>
<td>Seven feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Octameter</td>
<td>Eight feet</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The name for a metrical pattern of a line of verse identifies the number of feet the line contains. For example, an iambic trimeter is a line containing three feet of iambic meter. The following lines of a poem by Samuel Taylor Coleridge illustrate the different types of metrical lines:

- Iambic trimeter
  - Eight hundred of the brave
    (William Cowper)
  - I, how much more doth beauty beautiful seem
    (William Shakespeare)

Because iambic pentameter is so well suited to the rhythms of normal speech, writers frequently use it in plays and poems. Shakespeare's poems, for example, are written in unrhymed lines of iambic pentameter called blank verse (see p. 716).

Many other material combinations are also possible; a few are illustrated here:

- Trochaic trimeter
  - Trochee trips from long to short;

- Anapestic tetrameter
  - From long to long in solemn sort

- Dactylic hexameter
  - Slow Spondees stalks; strong foot! yet still able

- Iambic heptameter
  - Ever to come up with Dactyl tri-syllable.

- Iambic pentameter
  - Iambics march from short to long—

- Pyrrhic
  - With a leap and a bound the swift Anapests throng;

- Iambic trimeter
  - One syllable long, with one short at each side,

- Dactylic hexameter
  - amphibrachys hastens with a stately stride—

- Pyrrhic
  - first and last being long, middle short, Amphimacer

- Pyrrhic
  - strikes his thundering hoofs like a proud high-bred Racer.
A poet may use one kind of meter—iambic meter, for example—throughout a poem. Even so, the poet may vary line length to relieve monotony or to accommodate the demands of meaning or emphasis. In the following poem, the poet uses iambic lines of different lengths.

Emily Dickinson
(1830–1886)

I Like to See It Lap the Miles
(1891)

I like to see it lap the Miles—
And lick the Valleys up—
And stop to feed itself at Tanks—
And then—prodigious step
3 Around a Pile of Mountains—
And supercilious peep:
In Shanties—by the sides of Roads—
And then a Quarry pare
To fit its Ribs
30 And crawl between Complaining all the while
In horrid—hooting stanza—
Then chase itself down Hill—
And neigh like Boanerges¹
Then—punctual as a Star
Stop—docile and omnipotent
At its own stable door—

This poem is a single sentence that, except for some short pauses, is unbroken from beginning to end. Iambic lines of varying lengths suggest the movements of the train that the poet describes. Lines of iambic tetrameter, such as the first, give readers a sense of the train's rhythmic movement across a flat landscape, and shorter lines ("To fit its Ribs / And crawl between") suggest the train's slowing motion. Beginning with two iambic dimeter lines and progressing to iambic trimeter, the third stanza increases in speed just like the train that is racing down the hill "In horrid—hooting stanza—"

A poet can also use more than one type of metrical foot. Any variation in a metrical pattern—the substitution of a trochee for an iamb, for instance—immediately calls attention to itself. Poets are aware of this fact and use it to their advantage. For example, in line 16 of "I Like to See It Lap the Miles," the poet departs from iambic meter by placing unexpected stress on the first word, stop. By emphasizing this word, the poet brings the poem to an abrupt halt, suggesting the jolt riders experience when a train comes to a stop. In the following segment from "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," Samuel Taylor Coleridge also departs from the poem's dominant meter:

The ship was cheered, | the harks cleared,
Merrily did | we drop
| below | the kirk, | below | the hill,
| below | the lighthouse top.

Although these lines are arranged in iambic tetrameter, the poet uses a trochee in the second line, breaking the meter in order to accommodate the natural pronunciation of "merrily" as well as to place stress on the first word. Another way of varying the meter is to introduce a pause in the line, known as a caesura—a Latin word meaning "a cutting"—within a line. When scanning a poem, you indicate a caesura with two parallel lines.⁶ Unless a line of poetry is extremely short, it probably will contain one or two.

A caesura occurs after a punctuation mark or at a natural break in the sentence.

How do I love thee? || Let me count the ways.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

Two loves | I have || of comfort and despair.

William Shakespeare

Man on a throne of royal state, || which far
| exceeds the wealth of Ormus || and of Ind

John Milton

⁶ A vociferous preacher and orator. Also, the name, meaning "son of thunder," was given to apostles John and James because of their fiery zeal.
pause at this point, or they may continue, without a break, to the next line. Lines that have distinct pauses at the end—usually signaled by punctuation—are called end-stopped lines. Lines that do not have strong pauses are called run-on lines. (Sometimes the term jambment is used to describe this type of line.) End-stopped lines seem formal, or even forced, because their length is rigidly dictated by the poem's meter, rhythm, and rhyme scheme. In the following lines from John Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (p. 811), for example, rhythm, meter, and rhyme dictate the pauses that occur at the end of the lines:

> O, what can ail thee, knight-at-arms,
>     Alone and palely loitering?
> The sedge has withered from the lake,
>     And no birds sing.

In contrast to end-stopped lines, run-on lines seem more natural. Because their ending points are determined by the rhythms of speech and meaning and emphasis the poet wishes to convey rather than by meter, rhyme, run-on lines are suited to the open form of much modern poetry. In the following lines from the 1967 poem "We Have Come Home," poet Letrie Peters, run-on lines give readers the sense of spoken language.

> We have come home
>     From the bloodless war
>     With sunken hearts
>     Our boots full of pride—
>     From the true massacre of the soul
>     When we have asked
>     'What does it cost
>     To be loved and left alone?'

Rather than relying exclusively on end-stopped or run-on lines, poets often use a combination of the two to produce the effects they want. The juxtaposition of end-stopped and run-on lines controls the rhythm.

> I gaze upon the roast, >     that is sliced and laid out >     on my plate >     and over it
> I spoon the juices >     of carrot and onion.
> And for once I do not regret > the passage of time.

---

Poems for Further Reading: Rhythm and Meter

Adrienne Rich

(1929–)

Aunt Jennifer’s Tigers

(1951)

Aunt Jennifer’s tigers prance across a screen,
Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.
They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.

Aunt Jennifer’s fingers fluttering through her wool
Finds even the ivory needle hard to pull.
The massive weight of UncleIs wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer’s hand.

When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
The tigers in the panel that she made
Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

Reading and Reacting

What is the dominant metrical pattern of the poem? In what way does the meter enhance the contrast the poem develops?

The lines in the first stanza are end-stopped, and those in the second and third stanzas combine end-stopped and run-on lines. What does the poet achieve by varying the rhythm?

What ideas do the caesuras in the first and fourth lines of the last stanza emphasize?

Journal Entry What is the speaker’s opinion of Aunt Jennifer’s marriage? Do you think she is commenting on this particular marriage or on marriage in general?

Critical Perspective In her 1986 study of Rich’s work, The Aesthetics of Power, Claire Keyes writes of this poem that although it is formally beautiful, almost perfect, its voice creates problems:

> The tone seldom approaches intimacy, the speaker seeming fairly detached from the fate of Aunt Jennifer. . . . The dominant voice of the poem asserts the traditional theme that art outlives the person who produces it. . . . The speaker is almost callous in her disregard for Aunt’s death. . . . Who cares that Aunt Jennifer dies? The speaker does not seem to; she gets... caught up in those gorgeous tigers. . . . Here lies the dominant voice: Aunt is not compelling; her creation is.

Do you agree with Keyes’s reading of the poem?

Related Works: “Miss Brill” (p. 103), “Rooming Houses Are Old” (p. 666), “Ethics” (p. 821)

ETHERIDGE KNIGHT (1931–1991)

For Malcolm,1 a Year After (1986)

Compose for Red2 a proper verse;
Adhere to foot and strict iamb;
Control the burst of angry words
Or they might boil and break the dam.

Or they might boil and overflow
And drench me, drown me, drive me mad.
So swear no oath, so shed no tear,
And sing no song blue Baptist sad.

Evoke no image, stir no flame,
And spin no yarn across the air.
Make empty anglo tea lace words—
Make them dead white and dry bone bare.

Compose a verse for Malcolm man,
And make it rime and make it prim.
The verse will die—as all men do—
But not the memory of him!
Death might come singing sweet like C,
Or knocking like the old folk say,
The moon and stars may pass away.

But not the anger of that day.

Reading and Reacting

1. Why do you think Knight chooses to write a “proper verse” in “strict iamb”? Do you think this meter is an appropriate choice for his subject?

---

1 Malcolm X.
2 Malcolm X’s nickname when he was a young man.

What sounds and words are repeated in this poem? How does this repetition enhance the poem’s rhythm?

Where in the poem does Knight use caesuras? Why does he use this device in each instance?

JOURNAL ENTRY How would you describe the mood of the speaker? Is the poem’s meter consistent with his mood or in conflict with it? Explain.

Related Works: “In Memory of Donald A. Stauffer” (p. 728), “If We Must Die” (p. 817), “Medgar Evers” (p. 864)

Alliteration and Assonance

Alliteration and Assonance

In the poetry depends on rhythm, it also depends on the sounds of individual words. An effect pleasing to the ear, such as “Did he who made the sun make thee?” from William Blake’s “The Tyger” (p. 781), is called euphony. A jarring or discordant effect, such as “The vorpal blade wentсинcedorcul” from Lewis Carroll’s “Jabberwocky” (p. 710), is called cacophony.

One of the earliest, and perhaps the most primitive, methods of enhancing sound is onomatopoeia, which occurs when the sound of a word echoes its meaning, as it does in common words such as bang, crash, and whoo. Poets make broad application of this technique by using combinations of words that suggest a correspondence between sound and meaning. Edgar Allan Poe does in the following lines from his poem “The Soft is the strain when Zephyr gently blows,
And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
But when the loud surges lash the sounding shore,
The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar:
When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw.
The line too labors, and the words move slow.

After earlier admonishing readers that sound must echo sense, Poe uses onomatopoetic words such as lash and roar to convey the fury of these: and he uses repeated consonants to echo the sounds these words suggest. Notice, for example, how the s and m sounds suggest the gently blowing Zephyr and the flowing of the smooth stream and how the series of s sounds echoes the torrent's roar.

Alliteration—the repetition of consonant sounds in consecutive or neighboring words, usually at the beginning of words—is another device used to enhance sound in a poem. Both Poe ("sinks and swells") and Momaday ("smooth stream") make use of alliteration in the preceding excerpt. So does Alfred, Lord Tennyson in the following poem.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON
The Eagle
(1851)

He clasps the crag with crooked hands;
Close to the sun in lonely lands,
Ringed with the azure world, he stands.

The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls:
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunderbolt he falls.

Throughout the poem, c, l, and w sounds occur repeatedly. The poem is drawn together by the recurrence of these sounds and, as a result, it moves smoothly from beginning to end.

The following poem also uses alliteration to create special auditory effects.

N. SCOTT MOMADAY
(1934–)

Comparatives
(1976)

Sunlit sea,
the drift of fronds,
and banners
of bobbing boats—
the seaside
upon the planks,
the coil and crescent of flesh extending just into death.

Even so,
in the distant,
inland sea,
a shadow runs,
radiant,
rude in the rock:
fossil fish,
fissure of bone forever.
It is perhaps the same thing,
an agony
twice perceived.
It is most like wind on waves—
mere commotion,
mute and mean,
perceptible—
that is all.

Throughout the poem, Momaday uses alliteration to create a pleasing effect, and to link certain words and ideas. Each stanza of the poem has its own alliterative pattern: the first stanza contains repeated s and b sounds, the second stanza contains repeated r and f sounds, and the third stanza contains repeated w and m sounds. Not only does this use of alliteration create a pleasing effect, but also it reinforces the development of the theme from stanza to stanza.
Assonance—the repetition of the same or similar vowel sounds, especially in stressed syllables—can also enrich a poem. When used solely to produce aural effects, assonance can be distracting. Consider, for example, the clumsiness of the repeated vowel sounds in Tennyson's "Many a morland did we hear the coppers ring..." However, assonance can enhance a poem's effectiveness. Assonance can also unify an entire poem. In the following poem, assonance emphasizes the thematic connections among words and thus unifies the poem's ideas.

ROBERT HERRICK

(1591-1674)

Delight in Disorder

(1648)

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness.
A gown about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distraction;
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher;
A cuff neglectful, and thereby
Billows to flow confusedly;
A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat;
A careless shoe-string, in whose eye
I see a wild civility;
Do more bewitch me than when art
Is too precise in every part.

Repeated vowel sounds extend throughout this poem—for instance, "shoulders" and "thrown" in line 3, and "tie," "wild," and "precious" in lines 11, 12, and 14. Using alliteration as well as assonance, Herrick unites certain words—"tempestuous petticoat," for example. By connecting these words, he calls attention to the pattern of imagery that helps to organize the poem's theme.

---

RHyme

A second aspect of the preceding examples. Imperfect rhyme (also called near rhyme, approximate rhyme, or consonance) occurs when the final syllable sounds in two words are the same but vowel sounds are different—"learn/barn" or "pads/lids," for example. William Stafford uses imperfect rhyme in "Traveling through the Dark" (p. 836) when he rhymes "word" with "dead." Finally, eye rhyme occurs when two words look as if they should rhyme but do not—for example, "watch" and "catch."

Rhyme can also be classified according to the position of the rhyming words in a line of verse. The most common type of rhyme is end rhyme, which occurs at the end of a line:

Delight in Disorder by Robert Herrick

Rhyme

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness.
A gown about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distraction;
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher;
A cuff neglectful, and thereby
Billows to flow confusedly;
A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat;
A careless shoe-string, in whose eye
I see a wild civility;
Do more bewitch me than when art
Is too precise in every part.

A shawl made of fine fabric.
A heavily embroidered garment worn by females over the chest and stomach.

William Blake, "The Tyger"

Internal rhyme occurs within a line:

The Sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he!
And he shone bright and on the right
Went down into the sea.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge, "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner"

Beginning rhyme occurs at the beginning of a line:

Red River, red river,
The sun sent heat is silence.
No will is still as a river
Still. Will heat move

T. S. Eliot, "Virginia"

Rhyme can also be classified according to the number of corresponding syllables. Masculine rhyme (also called rising rhyme) occurs when single syllables correspond ("can"/"ran"; "descend"/"content"). Feminine rhyme (also called double rhyme or falling rhyme) occurs when two syllables, a stressed one followed by an unstressed one, correspond ("ocean"/"motion"; "leaping"/"sleeping"). Finally, triple rhyme occurs when three syllables correspond. Less common than the first two, triple rhyme is often used for humorous or satiric purposes, as in the following lines from the long poem Don Juan by Lord Byron:
Sagest of women, even of widows, she
Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon.
And worthy of the noblest pedigree:
(His sire of Castile, his dam from Aragon).

In some cases—for example, when it is overused or used in unusual places—rhyme can create unusual and even comic effects. In the following poem, humor is created by the incongruous connections established by rhymes such as “priest”/beast” and “pajama”/*llama.”

OGDEN NASH
(1902–1971)

The Lama
(1931)

The one-1 lama
He's a priest.
The two-1 llama,
He's a beast.

And I will bet
A silk pajama
There isn't any
Three-1 llama.

The conventional way to describe a poem's rhyme scheme is by listing the rhyming sounds that appear at the ends of lines. The sound that concludes the first line is designated a, and all subsequent lines that end in the same sound are also labeled a. The next sound to appear at the end of a line is designated b, and all other lines whose last sounds rhyme with it are also designated b—and so on through the alphabet. The lines of the poem that follows have been labeled in this manner.

RICHARD WILBUR
(1921–

A Sketch
(1975)

Into the lower right a Square of the window frame b
There came b with scalloped flight a

5 A goldfinch, lit upon c
The dead branch of a pine, d
Shining, d and then was gone, c

Tossed in a double arc e
Upward into the thatched f
And cross-hatched f
pine-needle dark. e

Briefly, as fresh drafts stirred g
The tree, he dulled and gleamed h
And seemed more coal than bird, g

Then, dodging down, returned i
In a new light, his perch j
A birch— j

twig, where he burned k

In the sun's broadside ray, k
Some seed pinched in his bill. l
Yet still i he did not stay, k

But into a leaf-choked pane, m
Changeful as even in heaven, n
Even n in Saturn's reign, m

Tunnel away and hid. o
And then? But I cannot well p
Tell you all that he did. o

It was like glancing at rough q
Sketches tacked on a wall, r
And all r so less than enough q

Of gold on beaten wing, s
I could not choose that one t
Be done t as the finished thing. s

Although the rhyme scheme of this poem (abba, cddc, and so on) is evident, it is hardly noticeable until it is charted. Despite its subtlety, however, the rhyme scheme is not unimportant. In fact, it reinforces the meaning and binds lines into structural units, connecting the first fourth as well as the second and third lines of each stanza. In stanza 1,
"right" and "flight" draw lines 1 and 4 of the stanza together, and "fame" and "came" in lines 2 and 3. The pattern begins again in the next stanza and continues through the rest of the poem. Like the goldfinch the poet describes, the rhymes are difficult to follow in the eye. In this sense, the rhyme reflects the central theme of the difficulty of capturing in words a reality which, like the goldfinch, is ever shifting.

Naturally, rhyme does not have to be subtle to enrich a poem. A obvious rhyme scheme can communicate meaning by connecting ideas that are not normally linked. Notice how Alexander Pope uses this technique in the following excerpt from An Essay on Man:

Plate 5 For Further Reading: Alliteration, Assonance, and Rhyme

G E R A R D M A N L E Y H O P K I N S

(1844-1889)

Pied Beauty

(1918)

Honour and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part, there all the honour lies.

Fortune in men has some small difference made,
One flaunts in rags, one flutters in brocade;
The cobbler aproned, and the parson gowned,
The friar hooded, and the monarch crowned.

"What differ more (you cry) than crown and cowl?"
I'll tell you, friend; a wise man and a fool.

You'll find, if once the monarch acts the monk,
Or, cobbler-like, the parson will be drunk,
Worth makes the man, and want of it, the fellow;
The rest is all but leather or prunella.¹

Stuck o'er with titles and hung round with strings,
That thou mayest be by kings, or whores of kings.

Boast the pure blood of an illustrious race,
In quiet flow from Lucrece² to Lucrece;
But by your fathers' worth if yours you rate,
Count me those only who were good and great.

The lines of this poem are written in heroic couplets, with rhyming scheme of aa, bb, cc, dd, and so on. In heroic couplets, greater emphasis on the second line of each pair, usually on the last word of the line, this word receives double emphasis strengthened both because of its position in the line and because it rhymed with the last word of the couplet's first line. In some cases, joins opposing ideas, thereby reinforcing a theme that runs through the passage: the contrast between the high and the low, the virtuous and immoral. For example, "gowned" and "crowned" in lines 5 and 6.

1 Heavy cloth the color of prunes.
2 In Roman legend, she stabbed herself after being defiled by Sextus Tarquinius.

---

Reading and Reacting

Summary

Examples of onomatopoeia, alliteration, assonance, imperfect rhyme, and perfect rhyme. Do you think all these techniques are essential to the poem? Are any of them annoying or distracting?

Journal Entry

Hopkins uses both pleasing and discordant sounds in his poem. Identify uses of euphony and cacophony, and explain how these techniques affect your reactions to the poem.

Works Cited:

"Women" (p. 744), "I Never Saw a Moor" (p. 788), "Batter my Three-Personed God" (p. 790)
Presentation Rubric

Evaluating Student Presentations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>1</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>4</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audience cannot understand presentation because there is no sequence of information.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Audience has difficulty following presentation because student jumps around.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student presents information in logical sequence which audience can follow.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student presents information in logical, interesting sequence which audience can follow.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Subject Knowledge</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student does not have grasp of information; student cannot answer questions about subject.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student is uncomfortable with information and is able to answer only rudimentary questions.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student is at ease with expected answers to all questions, but fails to elaborate.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student demonstrates full knowledge (more than required) by answering all class questions with explanations and elaboration.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Graphics</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student uses superfluous graphics or no graphics</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student occasionally uses graphics that rarely support text and presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student's graphics relate to text and presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student's graphics explain and reinforce screen text and presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mechanics</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student's presentation has four or more spelling errors and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Presentation has three misspellings and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Presentation has no more than two misspellings and/or grammatical errors.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Presentation has no misspellings or grammatical errors.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eye Contact</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student reads all of report with no eye contact.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student occasionally uses eye contact, but still reads most of report.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student maintains eye contact most of the time but frequently returns to notes.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student maintains eye contact with audience, seldom returning to notes.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Elocution</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student mumbles, incorrectly pronounces terms, and speaks too quietly for students in the back of class to hear.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student's voice is low. Student incorrectly pronounces terms. Audience members have difficulty hearing presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student's voice is clear. Student pronounces most words correctly. Most audience members can hear presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Student uses a clear voice and correct, precise pronunciation of terms so that all audience members can hear presentation.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total Points:
Essay Rubric

Directions: Your essay will be graded based on this rubric. Consequently, use this rubric as a guide when writing your essay and check it again before you submit your essay.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Traits</th>
<th>4</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>1</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Focus &amp; Details</td>
<td>There is one clear, well-focused topic. Main ideas are clear and are well supported by detailed and accurate information.</td>
<td>There is one clear, well-focused topic. Main ideas are clear but are not well supported by detailed information.</td>
<td>There is one topic. Main ideas are somewhat clear.</td>
<td>The topic and main ideas are not clear.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td>The introduction is inviting, states the main topic, and provides an overview of the paper. Information is relevant and presented in a logical order. The conclusion is strong.</td>
<td>The introduction states the main topic and provides an overview of the paper. A conclusion is included.</td>
<td>There is no clear introduction, structure, or conclusion.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Voice</td>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is very clear, and there is strong evidence of attention to audience. The author’s extensive knowledge and/or experience with the topic is evident.</td>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is somewhat clear, and there is some evidence of attention to audience. The author’s knowledge and/or experience with the topic is evident.</td>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is unclear.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Word Choice</td>
<td>The author uses vivid words and phrases. The choice and placement of words seems accurate, natural, and not forced.</td>
<td>The author uses vivid words and phrases. The choice and placement of words seems inaccurate at times and/or seems overdone.</td>
<td>The author uses words that communicate clearly, but the writing lacks variety.</td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sentence Structure,</td>
<td>All sentences are well constructed and have varied structure and length. The author makes no errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling.</td>
<td>Most sentences are well constructed and have a similar structure and length. The author makes a few errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling, but they do not interfere with understanding.</td>
<td>Most sentences are well constructed, but they have a similar structure and/or length. The author makes several errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling that interfere with understanding.</td>
<td>Sentences sound awkward, are distractingly repetitive, or are difficult to understand. The author makes numerous errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling that interfere with understanding.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grammar, Mechanics,</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spelling</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Reviewer’s Comments

Copyright 2009 IRA/NCTE. All rights reserved.

ReadWriteThink materials may be reproduced for educational purposes.
Lesson Plan
(SAP)

Course: Poetry 1
Credit Hour: ?

Study Program: English
Code: ING 208

Faculty: Arts and Languages
Docent: Dr. Kurnia Ningsih, M.A.
: Delvi Wahyuni, S.S., M.A.

Learning Outcomes

Main Competence:
 Upon the completion of the course, students are expected to be able appreciate poetry, especially the ones written in English

Supporting Competence:
 Students are able to analyze thoughts or ideas conveyed in poetry

Soft skills/Character: Students are endowed with the ability to collaborate with others; express their opinion; show high commitment and passion in what they are doing; read between the lines and think critically.

Topics:
1. ACCORDING TO MY MOOD (Benjamin Zephaniah)
2. Language Barrier (Valerie Bloom)
3. Background, Casually (Nissim Ezekiel)
4. Do Not Say (Mohamad Bin Haji Saleh)
5. Sun-a-shine, Rain-a-fall (Valerie Bloom)
Lesson Plan

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>stage</th>
<th>Lecturer’s Activities</th>
<th>Students’ activities</th>
<th>Assessment</th>
<th>Media</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| Introduction | 1. Explain the overview of lesson in meeting 14-16
2. Explain the benefit students can gain from their ability to analyze ideas and thoughts conveyed in poetry
3. Explain the competences they should achieve by the end of meeting 16 | Listen to the lecture                        | A 3-4 pages paper discussing ideas and thoughts conveyed in poems of their choice | Syllabus                   |
| Presentation | 1. Activate students’ background knowledge on the nature of poetry and elements of poetry
2. Remind them of active reading strategy in helping them to understand the poems and get to ideas and thoughts it might convey
3. Lead a class discussion on the following poem:
a. ACCORDING TO MY MOOD (Benjamin Zephaniah)
b. Language Barrier (Valerie Bloom)
c. Background, Casually (Nissim) | Respond to the questions
Students work in group to dig out possible ideas and thoughts conveyed in poems assigned to them. | An anthology of several poems which bear similarities in ideas or thoughts | Photocopied texts which have been forwarded to them in advance. |
Closing

4. Close the session.
   - Ask students questions on topics which have been covered
   - Respond to students' answer
   - Assign them to be prepared for the anthology project

Assessment Rubric:

References:

Appendices

1. Photocopied material forwarded to students in advance

Sap3poetry12012
2. Rubric for students' essay
3. Rubric for student's anthology
APPENDICES AND PHOTOCOPIED MATERIAL WHICH SERVES AS BOTH TEACHING MATERIAL AND STUDENTS’ WORK SHEET
Part III

A selection of poems from the Postcolonial World

Muhammad Haji Salih
Nissim Ezekiel
Benjamin Zephaniah
VALERIE BLOOM

1956—

Sun-a-shine, Rain-a-fall

Sun a-shine an' rain a-fall,
The Devil an' him wife cyan 'gree at all,
The two o' them want one fish-head,
The Devil call him wife bonehead,
She hiss her teeth, call him cock-eye,
Greedy, worthless an' workshy,
While them busy callin' name,
The puss walk in, sey is a shame
To see a nice fish go to was'e,
Left with a big grin pon him face.

BENJAMIN ZEPHANIAH

1958—

ACCORDING TO MY MOOD

I have poeti license, i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
i d o t h e way i w a n t.
when me and she eye
mek four the world was neither more or less but a moment of rightness

we tongue locked in a syntax of yes

Language usage Bennett, Reid, Sparrow, Brathwaite (3), Bloom, Breeze; TransC. Johnson, D’Aguiar

VALERIE BLOOM (1956– )

Language Barrier

Jamaica language sweet yuh know bwoy,
An yuh know mi neba notice i’,
'Til tarra day one foreign fren'
Come spen some time wid mi.

An den im call mi attention to
Some tings im sey sou’ queer,
Like de way wi always sey 'kon yah'
When we really mean 'look here'.

Den annooda ting whey puzzle im,
Is how wi lub 'repeat' wise'
For de ongle time im repeat a wud
Is when smaddy half deaf.

Todda day im a walk outa road
An when im a pass one gate,
Im see one bwoy a one winda,
An one nodda one outside a wait.

Im sey dem did look kine o' nice
Soh im ben a go sey howdy,
But im tap shart when de fus' bwoy sey
'A ready yuh ready aready'
GRACE NICHOLS (1950– )

One Continent/To Another

Child of the middle passage womb push daughter of a vengeful Chi she came into the new world
birth aching her pain from one continent/to another moaning her belly cry sounding the wind and after fifty years she hasn’t forgotten hasn’t forgotten
how she had lain there in her own blood
lain there in her own shit ‘bleeding memories in the darkness how she stumbled onto the shore how the metals dragged her down how she thirsted . . . .

But being born a woman
she moved again knew it was the Black Beginning though everything said it was the end

55 facey: impudent, cheeky.
1 middle passage womb: Atlantic slave ship.
3 Chi: personal god.
A poet-rascal-clown was born,
The frightened child who would not eat
Or sleep, a boy of meagre bone.
He never learnt to fly a kite,
His borrowed top refused to spin.

I went to Roman Catholic school,
A mugging Jew among the wolves.
They told me I had killed the Christ,
That year I won the scripture prize.

I grew in terror of the strong
But undernourished Hindu lads,
Their prepositions always wrong,
Repelled me by passivity.

One noisy day I used a knife.

At home on Friday nights the prayers
Were said. My morals had declined.
I heard of Yoga and of Zen.
Could I, perhaps, be rabbi-saint?
The more I searched, the less I found.
Twenty-two: time to go abroad.
First, the decision, then a friend
To pay the fare. Philosophy,
Poverty and Poetry, three Companions shared mystudent room.

The London seasons passed me by.
I lay in bed two years alone.
And then a Woman came to tell
My willing ears I was the Son
Of Man. I knew that I had failed.

In everything, a bitter thought.
So, in an English cargo-ship
Taking French guns and mortar shells
To Indo-China, scrubbed the decks.
And learned to laugh again at home.

How to feel it home, was the point.
Some reading had been done, but what
Had I observed, except my own Exasperation? All Hindus are Like that, my father used to say.

When someone talked too loudly, or Knocked at the door like the Devil.
They hawked and spat. They sprawled around.
I prepared for the worst. Married,
Changed jobs, and saw myself a fool.

The song of my experience sung,
I knew that all was yet to sing.
My ancestors, among the castes,
Were aliens crushing seed for bread
(The hooded bullock made his rounds).

One among them fought and taught,
A Major bearing British arms.
He told my father sad stories
Of the Boer War. I dreamed that Fierce men had bound my feet and hands.
The later dreams were all of words.
I did not know that words betray
But let the poems come, and lost
That grip on things the worldly prize.
I would not suffer that again.

I look about me now, and try
To formulate a plainer view:

\[\text{footnote: crushting seed: Bene Israel tradition has it that their ancestors took to oil pressing soon after arrival in India. Hence Shabbat oil-pressers, i.e. those who did not work on Saturdays. (author's note.)}\]
The wise survive and serve—to play
The fool, to cash in on
The inner and the outer storms.

The Indian landscape sears my eyes.
I have become a part of it
To be observed by foreigners.
They say that I am singular,
Their letters overstate the case.
I have made my commitments now.
This is one: to stay where I am,
As others choose to give themselves
In some remote and backward place.
My backward place is where I am.

§ Diverse cultural inheritances/borderline protagonists Aus: Malouf; Carib: Walcott (2); SEA: Somtow

2: The Patriot

I am standing for peace and non-violence.
Why world is fighting, fighting,
Why all people of world
Are not following Mahatma Gandhi
I am simply not understanding.
Ancient Indian Wisdom is 100% correct,
I should say even 200% correct.
But Modern generation is neglecting
Too much going for fashion and foreign thing.

Other day I'm reading in newspaper
(Every day I'm reading Times of India
To improve my English Language)
How one goonda fellow
Throw stone at Indirabehn.
Must be student unrest fellow, I am thinking.
Friends, Romans, Countrymen, I am saying
(to myself)
Lend me the ears.
Everything is coming—
Regeneration, Remuneration, Contraception.
Be patiently, brothers and sisters.

13 goonda: rogue.
14 Indirabehn: Indira Gandhi, literally 'Sister India'.
WONG PHUI NAM (1935– )

Prospect in Spring

At the death of great houses the waste of cities
the land returns to desolation of its rivers and its hills:
the high walls under a mild sun lie fissured opened in great wounds
to the ravening tide of spring.
These flowers that well up from the ground are tears I will weep against adversity.
I think of you my children. My fear darkens around this chirruping of sparrows
flying beneath the walls.
The skies these nights are louring red with beacon fires
built for the invasion.
I would there were news from home.

Daily the comb slips more easily through my hair.
Of little use my passions held this hair-pin in my fingers which will not catch then falls from the hair against the palm.

MOHAMAD BIN HAJI SALLEH (1942– )

Do Not Say

do not say my people are lazy
because you do not know.
you are only a critic, an onlooker.
you cannot know or judge,
5 passing the kampong in your car,
staring at economic data.

Do not think my people are weak:
because they are gentle,
because they do not build skyscrapers.

10 have you ever worked in a ladang, or danced the ronggeng?
can you sing the dondang sayang?
do not think that we have only music because we love life.

15 do not write that we have no literature, culture.
have you ever listened to the sajak or pantun stayed a night at the bangsawan?

19 have you read the epic shairs or the theological theses?

20 how many times have you wondered about history in the blade
and ancestry in the handle of the kris, or felt the pattern of the songket?
have you lived in a kampong?

25 do not condemn us as poor because we have very few banks.
see, here the richness of our people,
the brimful hearts that do not grab or grapple.
we collect humanity from sun and rain and man, transcending the business and the money.

30 do not tell us how to live or organize such nice associations and bodies.
our society was an entity
before the advent of political philosophy.

35 do not say –
because you do not know.

§ Language usage Carib: Brathwaite (3), Bloom; NZSP: Tuwhare

10 ladang: clearing for non-irrigated farming.
12 dondang sayang: a type of verse in which both members of a couple sing verses alternately.
16 sajak: form of modern Malay verse.
21 bangsawan: Malay opera.
22 songket: hand-woven shawl, shot with gold or silver thread.
WRITING ASSIGNMENT ON TONE

Choose a poem from this chapter, and analyze its speaker’s attitude toward the poem’s main subject. Examine the author’s choice of specific words and images to create the particular tone used to convey the speaker’s attitudes. (Possible subjects include Wilfred Owen’s attitude toward war in “Dulce et Decorum Est,” the tone and imagery of Weldon Kees’s “For My Daughter,” Ted Hughes’s view of the workings of nature in “Hawk Roosting,” and Anne Bradstreet’s attitude toward her own poetry in “The Author to Her Book.”)

Here is an example of an essay written for this assignment by Kim Larsen, a student of Karen Locke’s at Lane Community College in Eugene, Oregon.

SAMPLE STUDENT PAPER

Kim Larsen
Professor Locke
English 110
21 November 2009

Word Choice, Tone, and Point of View in Roethke’s “My Papa’s Waltz”

Some readers may find Theodore Roethke’s “My Papa’s Waltz” a reminiscence of a happy childhood scene. I believe, however, that the poem depicts a more painful and complicated series of emotions. By examining the choice of words that Roethke uses to convey the tone of his scene, I will demonstrate that beneath the seemingly comic situation of the poem is a darker story. The true point of view of “My Papa’s Waltz” is that of a resentful adult reliving his fear of a domineering parent.

The first clue that the dance may not have been a mutually enjoyable experience is in the title itself. The author did not title the poem “Our Waltz” or “Waltzing with My Papa,” either of which would set an initial tone for readers to expect a shared, loving sentiment. It does not even have a neutral title, such as “The Waltz.” The title specifically implies that the waltz was exclusively the father’s. Since a waltz normally involves two people, it can be reasoned that the father dances his waltz without regard for his young partner.

Examining each stanza of the poem offers numerous examples where the choice of words sustains the tone implied in the title. The first line, “The whiskey on your breath,” conjures up an olfactory image that most would find unpleasant. The small boy finds it so overpowering he is made “dizzy.” This stanza contains the only simile in the poem, “I hung on like death” (3), which creates a ghastly and stark visual image. There are many choices of similes to convey an intended image. The first stanza ends by stating the “waltzing was not easy.” The definitions of easy, as found in Merriam-Webster’s Collegiate Dictionary, include “free from pain, annoyance or anxiety,” and “not difficult to endure or undergo” (“Easy”). Obviously the speaker did not find those qualities in the waltz.

Further evidence of this harsh and oppressive scene is brought to mind by reckless disregard for “the pans / Slid from the kitchen shelf” (5–6), which the reader can almost hear crashing on the floor in loud cacophony, and the “mother’s countenance,” which “[c]ould not unfrown itself” (7, 8). If this were only a silly, playful romp between father and son, even a stern, fastidious mother might be expected to at least make an unsuccessful attempt to suppress a grin. Instead, the reader gets a visual image of a silent, unhappy woman, afraid, probably because of past experience, to interfere in the domestic destruction around her. Once more, this detail suggests a dominating father who controls the family.

The third stanza relates the father’s “battered” hand holding the boy’s wrist. The tactile image of holding a wrist suggests dragging or forcing an unwilling person, not holding hands as would be expected with a mutual dance partner. Further disregard for the son’s feelings is displayed by the lines “At every step you missed / My right ear scraped a buckle” (11–12). In each missed step, probably due to his drunkenness, the father causes the boy physical pain.

The tone continues in the final stanza as the speaker recalls “You beat time on my head / With a palm caked hard by dirt” (13–14). The visual and tactile image of a dirt-hardened hand beating on a child’s head as if it were a drum is distinctly unpleasant. The last lines, “Then waltzed me off to bed / Still clinging to your shirt” (15–16), are the most ambiguous in the poem. It can be reasoned, as X. J. Kennedy and Dana Gioia do, that the lines suggest "the boy is still clinging to his father with persistent if also complicated love" (20). On the other hand, if one notices the earlier dark images, the conclusion could describe a boy clinging out of fear, the physical fear of being dropped by one who is drunk and the emotional fear of not being loved and nurtured as a child needs to be by his father.

It can also be argued that the poem's rollicking rhythm contributes to a sense of fun, and in truth, the poem can be read in that fashion. On the other hand, it can be read in such a way as to de-emphasize the rhythm, as the author himself does in his recording of "My Papa's Waltz" (Roethke, Reads). The joyful, rollicking rhythm can be seen as ironic. By reminding readers of a waltzing tempo, it is highlighting the discrepancy between what a waltz should be and the bleak, frightening picture painted in the words.

While "My Papa's Waltz" can be read as a roughhouse comedy, by examining Roethke's title and choice of words closely to interpret the meaning of their images and sounds, it is also plausible to hear an entirely different tone. I believe "My Papa's Waltz" employs the voice of an embittered adult remembering a harsh scene in which both he and his mother were powerless in the presence of a drunk and domineering father.

---

Works Cited

Essay Rubric

Directions: Your essay will be graded based on this rubric. Consequently, use this rubric as a guide when writing your essay and check it again before you submit your essay.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Traits</th>
<th>4</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>1</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Focus &amp; Details</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>There is one clear, well-focused topic. Main ideas are clear and are well supported by detailed and accurate information.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The topic and main ideas are not clear.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The introduction is inviting, states the main topic, and provides an overview of the paper. Information is relevant and presented in a logical order. The conclusion is strong.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>There is no clear introduction, structure, or conclusion.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>There is one clear, well-focused topic. Main ideas are clear but are not well supported by detailed information.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>There is no clear introduction, structure, or conclusion.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The introduction states the main topic and provides an overview of the paper. A conclusion is included.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>There is no clear introduction, structure, or conclusion.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Organization</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is very clear, and there is strong evidence of attention to audience. The author’s extensive knowledge and/or experience with the topic is evident.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is somewhat clear, and there is some evidence of attention to audience. The author’s knowledge and/or experience with the topic is limited.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author’s purpose of writing is somewhat clear, and there is some evidence of attention to audience. The author’s knowledge and/or experience with the topic is limited.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Voice</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author uses vivid words and phrases. The choice and placement of words seems accurate, natural, and not forced.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author uses vivid words and phrases. The choice and placement of words is inaccurate at times and/or seems overdone.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The author uses words that communicate clearly, but the writing lacks variety.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>The writer uses a limited vocabulary. Jargon or clichés may be present and detract from the meaning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Word Choice</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>All sentences are well constructed and have varied structure and length. The author makes no errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Sentences sound awkward, are distractingly repetitive, or are difficult to understand. The author makes numerous errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Most sentences are well constructed and have varied structure and length. The author makes a few errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling, but they do not interfere with understanding.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Sentences sound awkward, are distractingly repetitive, or are difficult to understand. The author makes numerous errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sentences sound awkward, are distractingly repetitive, or are difficult to understand. The author makes several errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling that interfere with understanding.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Sentences sound awkward, are distractingly repetitive, or are difficult to understand. The author makes numerous errors in grammar, mechanics, and/or spelling.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reviewer's Comments</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Poetry Anthology Rubric

Name_________________________________________ Date___________

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Item</th>
<th>Points</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>I. Poems you've written</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Your name, date</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ten or more</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II. Poems you've collected</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author, response to each</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Forty or more</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III. Organization</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title page</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Table of contents/sections</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV. Reflections on poetry</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V. Artistic effects/neatness</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total points

Reviewed by

Workshop 3, Johnson
Write in the Middle